Everybody knows the Democratic Party's superdelegate problem: if Barack Obama wins the popular vote, as he probably will, and wins the highest number of elected delegates, as he almost certainly will, and the party leaders turn to Hillary Clinton instead, there will be a revolution in the rank and file that could damage the party for years to come.

But in San Francisco, that happens all the time.

The local Democratic Party is run by the Democratic County Central Committee, and 24 of the members are elected, democratically. But every Democrat who holds an elected office representing San Francisco, and every Democratic nominee for office, automatically gets a seat on the committee, too — so you've got another eight or so (it varies) people on the panel who are the local equivalent of superdelegates. US Sen. Dianne Feinstein is on the county committee. So is Board of Equalization member Betty Yee and state senator Leland Yee. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has a seat. Rep. Tom Lantos was on the committee until he died; his replacement, almost certainly Jackie Speier, will take over his slot this week.

Of course, none of those high-powered types ever show up for committee meetings. They send proxies, either trusted advisors or staffers from their local offices. And often — all too often — those superdelegate proxies are the deciding votes on local issues.

See, the committee may not be the highest profile office in the land, but it has a fair amount of local clout. The central committee decides what position the Democratic Party takes on local issues — and that means both influence and money. The party endorsement on ballot measures can be influential, particularly when it comes with a place on the official party slate card.

These days the committee has a majority of elected progressives. But it's not an overwhelming majority — since half the seats are apportioned by Assembly districts, half the grassroots members are from the west side of town and tend to be more moderate. And not all of the eastsiders are progressives.

So on key endorsements this year — for San Francisco supervisor, for example — the majority of the elected delegates will probably vote for the progressives. But a minority will support the slate backed by Mayor Gavin Newsom — and the superdelegates will mostly go along.

So the Newsom slate at the very least will block the progressives from getting the endorsements. In fact, for a progressive candidate or ballot measure to get the party nod in a contested race requires an almost impossible majority of the elected members.

It can be infuriating.

Supervisors Chris Daly and Aaron Peskin, who often don't get along, are working together to get a solid progressive slate elected to the DCCC this June. It's a good idea, and there's a good chance many of the 24 slate members will win. But the will of the voters won't matter if the superdelegates can still weigh in and screw up any real reform.

I suppose it's possible to change to rules to kick the superdelegates off the committee, but that would be a brutal battle. And there's a much easier solution:

The committee needs to eliminate proxy votes.

Feinstein can't use a proxy to vote on the Senate floor. Pelosi can't send a proxy to vote in the House of Representatives. Proxies aren't allowed in the state Legislature. Why should the DCCC be any different?

If Dianne Feinstein really cares about Gavin Newsom's slate of supervisory candidates this fall, then she can show up at the committee meeting and vote. Otherwise the grassroots, elected delegates get to decide. Seems fair to me. SFBG

A big step for public services

EDITORIAL The battle against privatization of public resources took a big step forward this week when Sup. Ross Mirkarimi introduced a measure to create a Public Services Advisory Board to monitor what he calls the creeping takeover of city government by private outfits.

The new agency would monitor outsourcing of public services and advise the supervisors on whether it makes fiscal and policy sense to turn city programs over to businesses and nonprofits.

It's also a chance to push forward on public power, the disaster at the zoo, the move to privatize the golf courses and some parks, Mayor Gavin Newsom's efforts to hand the city's information technology infrastructure over to private companies, and the Presidio sellout.

The legislation is the first public effort of a new coalition called San Francisco Commons. The group includes labor, public power, neighborhood groups, and environmental activists and was formed to address the growing problem of the loss of public sector services. It's a crucial new addition to the city's political scene: the first organization specifically established to protect public services and public property.

The case against privatization is clear. Private entities aren't required to make their finances public (even if they're doing public service work with public money). And companies doing work on city contracts are motivated by profits, sometimes at the expense of the public interest. Typically, when private operators take over public services, the prices go up, worker pay goes down, and the quality of the delivery tanks. Just look at the Presidio, a national park that's been turned into a private real estate development, or the zoo, where privatization has led to misspent funds, poor conditions for animals, and a tragic tiger escape. Or look at Edison School, the failed experiment in education privatization in San Francisco.

San Francisco ought to be in the forefront of the antiprivatization battle nationwide, and this new group and legislation is a good first step. The agenda for the new advisory board is extensive: the panel needs to look at every large and small privatization move at City Hall. It needs to evaluate and report to the supervisors on the flaws in the mayor's schemes. It also needs to look forward actively at ways the city can bring more essential services under public control. That includes moving forward on community choice aggregation and then developing a plan to create a full-scale, citywide public power system. Public broadband service ought to be on the agenda, too.

The supervisors should approve Mirkarimi's bill, and the sooner the better, before Newsom finds some more of San Francisco to put on the block. SFBG

After Home Depot

EDITORIAL The proposal to build a Home Depot store on Bayshore Boulevard was a textbook example of terrible city planning. The community never asked for a big-box chain store; no city plans ever discussed how big-box retail would help the local economy. Instead, about eight years ago the giant Atlanta-based corporation decided it wanted a store in San Francisco, hired Jack Davis, a political consultant close to then-Mayor Willie Brown, and, after a brutal and unpleasant battle, got permission to build a giant suburban-style outlet of more than 100,000 square feet with a massive parking garage in a city where transit and pedestrian access are considered primary land-use values.

And now that Home Depot has decided, based on its business projections, that the whole thing was a bad idea and is backing out, San Francisco has a chance to turn the big empty lot on Bayshore into something that serves the community. There's a chance to make this a model for city planning, an example of how to do economic development right for a change. The mayor, city planners, and the supervisors need to insist on a credible process.

From the start, the fight over Home Depot was toxic, pitting small business owners, who feared that the discount chain would destroy local merchants, and Bernal Heights residents, who feared the traffic, noise, and pollution a car-dependent outlet would bring to the area, against Bayview-Hunters Point residents who desperately needed jobs. Home Depot lobbyists did their best to push the divide, arguing that employment opportunities at the store would help spur economic development in one of the city's poorest neighborhoods.

Lost in the rhetoric was the fact that the chain promised only about 200 new jobs, and would offer only a "good-faith effort" to hire half of those people from the neighborhood. In other words, at best, an eight-acre CONTINUES ON PAGE 6 project — one of the biggest retail developments in the city — would lead to 100 new jobs for Bayview residents. That was, to put it mildly, an abysmal deal.

An environmental impact report on the project essentially dismissed all of the neighborhood concerns, even arguing that air-quality impacts from increased car exhaust wouldn't count as an impact. The report tossed aside the fate of small businesses, particularly hardware stores, by saying that the store owners could simply start selling something else. Still, the supervisors voted to approve the project.

But now, after all that bitterness and expense, Home Depot is walking away, citing a sluggish market for home-improvement products. Mayor Gavin Newsom is begging the company not to abandon the plans altogether; he's urging Home Depot executives to put the project on hold until the economy improves. That's tantamount to saying that the Bayshore site should stay vacant for a few more years — which does no good for anybody. Instead of whining and begging a big corporation to bestow its blessings on poor San Francisco, Newsom ought to look at this as an opportunity.

Sup. Tom Ammiano, whose district borders on the site and who led the opposition to Home Depot, is calling for a community planning process that would bring the key stakeholders to the table to talk about how that land should be used. Sup. Sophie Maxwell, a Home Depot supporter whose district includes the site, ought to join with him. The goal ought to be a planning process that starts with the right questions: What sort of development does the community want? What use would create the most jobs that best fit the local labor pool and the employment needs of the area? What would benefit the city's economy without damaging small business? Should part of the site be used for affordable housing?

There are all sorts of possibilities, but given Newsom's pledge to be a "green mayor" and the value of new green-collar jobs, one obvious idea might be turning the place into a solar-energy center. Proper zoning, incentives, and public encouragement might attract solar manufacturing, solar installation services, and a solar hardware store with do-it-yourself kits for homeowners.

The city obviously can't dictate what sorts of businesses would want to move to Bayshore, but planners can set criteria to steer development. That process ought to begin now, openly, with every interested party involved — and it should have a bottom line: no more suburban chain stores in San Francisco. BPFO

Aerial spraying will not eradicate the Light Brown Apple Moth.

Play, don't spray

OPINION On Aug. 1, 2008, the California Department of Food and Agriculture plans to spray the San Francisco Bay Area from the air with a time-released pesticide in an effort to wipe out the Light Brown Apple Moth (LBAM). There will be continuous spraying every 30 to 90 days for the next two to 10 years. We can't leave town for the weekend and come back when it's clear; there will be no "all-clear" to come home to. The CDFA claims that the spray "should be" safe, despite that it has never been independently tested and no environmental studies have been done.

We represent concerned families with children, pets, and loved ones with respiratory ailments. The more we research this proposal, the more upset and opposed we're becoming. Thus far we've learned that the pheromone pesticide, Checkmate OLF-R, is untested, contains known carcinogens and endocrine disruptors, and is delivered in time-released microcapsules that can be inhaled and lodged in the lungs, causing respiratory harm.

Here are some of the warnings on the Checkmate label:

KEEP OUT OF REACH OF CHILDREN... Harmful if absorbed through the skin. Harmful if inhaled...

IF ON SKIN OR CLOTHING: Take off contaminated clothing. Rinse skin immediately with plenty of water for 15-20 minutes. Call poison control...

The US Department of Agriculture announced emergency funding to combat the LBAM infestation in California, bypassing the normal safety and environmental studies, and asks us to take on faith that aerial spraying is necessary and safe. How many times have we been told something was safe only to hear a big "oops" a few years or decades later? Thalidomide, DDT, Agent Orange.... The most vulnerable populations include fetuses, pregnant women, and children.

Biologists and etymologists agree that aerial spraying will not accomplish the CDFA goal of eradicating the moth. Instead, they encourage focus on containment. Less invasive, integrated pest management solutions for the LBAM exist and are working for other countries such as New Zealand, whose climate and flora are comparable to California's. Aerial spraying is expensive, outdated, unsustainable, and — ultimately — likely to be unsuccessful.

What is even more alarming is that the LBAM has not proven to be a devastating pest elsewhere. It has not caused crop damage in Hawaii over the past 100 years. Europe has no restrictions against it. According to a report published by horticulturalists Daniel Harder and Jeff Rosendale, the moth rarely penetrates fruit, does not defoliate plants, and at worst causes only cosmetic damage. We don't want to be the guinea pigs for this wasteful, thoughtless, and high-risk approach. Do not sit quietly.

Get educated, spread the word, and contact our elected officials to say that we will not stand by and let this happen. Email your supervisor here: www.sfgov.org/site/bdsupvrs_index.asp. Write to Assembly and Senate members here: forum/stophespray.org/viewtopic.php?f=19&ct=592.

We are planning a peaceful "play-in" with children present on Monday, April 28 at 10 a.m. in front of City Hall to show our strength against this immoral and illegal plan. Play, not spray. SFBG

TAKE THE BUS TO CHURCH

Shall we drive our cars to church ("Take the bus to church," 3/26/08) or to antiwar rallies? No. Our troops are in Iraq for oil.

We need to de-escalate on our oil-driven lives by walking, bicycling, taking public transportation, carpooling, hitchhiking, foregoing all motorized recreation and leisure driving, voluntarily rationing gasoline by driving fewer days a week, etc.

Rather than providing illegal parking for churchgoers, protesters, or anyone else, we ought to offer free public transportation for all on Sundays. With a world-class mass transit system in BART and great public transportation running throughout the city, and US troops killing and dying in an oil-rich region, parking should not be a concern.

THERE OUGHT TO BE RULES

I live on Dolores Street, and I actually like the parking in the median and left lane on Sundays. It gives people a place to park so they can sit in the park all day, and it brings people to local restaurants and shops. However, I think it should be codified somehow. At around 7 p.m. every Sunday, the tow trucks will come by and tow away about 50-100 cars from the neighborhood — some fucking racket that is. Here's my suggestion: put up signs that read, "Parking on Sunday in median, 9 a.m.-6 p.m." Let everybody know what the rules are.

dispelled when I saw the American Sign Language gesture for "I love you" printed on the front page. Anyone at any of the reported shows, save a handful of posers who act purely out of inexperience, could have told you that the metal horns are indeed horns, as in a goat's horns, as in I've never seen a goat with a horn sticking out of the side of his face. Anton LaVey's use of the gesture linked it to Satanism, but Ronnie James Dio, after replacing Ozzy in Black Sabbath, was the one to popularize its use in metal. Also, the 10-fingered gesture labeled "the goat" is not a goat; it's a pentagram.

The new zoo blues

A scathing report shows how the privatized SF zoo spent its bond money on tourist traps, not animals

By G.W. Schulz

> gwschulz@sfbg.com

Ten years ago, the San Francisco Zoo asked voters for $48 million in bonds to overhaul its decaying animal enclosures, rebuild its entrance, expand educational facilities for children, and make a host of other improvements.

Every major figure in San Francisco with even an ounce of political ambition made sure his or her name was attached to the voter information pamphlet that went out to residents in 1997 urging passage of the bonds.

The list included Willie Brown, Dianne Feinstein, and Nancy Pelosi; members of the community college and school boards; the district attorney and city attorney then in office; Republican judges and local chambers of commerce; and countless grade school teachers.

The entire board of supervisors signed on, declaring that the improvements would "include new habitats where many of the animals will experience grass under their feet for the first time."

Prop. C passed, and the private San Francisco Zoological Society, which had taken control of the zoo from the city five years before, was on its way to introducing real live sod to exotic animal species. Just like a sanctuary, or even the wild itself.

But it hasn't quite turned out like the pretty pictures suggested.

On March 18, the San Francisco Animal Control and Welfare Commission quietly released a report that made it clear many of the promises of that bond campaign were never kept. The private zoo didn't spend the money the way all of those giddy city officials had told the voters it would.

The report was largely overlooked because on the same day the Association of Zoos and Aquariums, which inspects San Francisco's zoo for accreditation, released its own long-anticipated investigation of what happened at Christmastime when a hulking Siberian tiger named Tatiana mauled three people, killing one.

That attack, as we all know now from the relentless headlines, is the sexier story. But the commission, in a document with much greater long-term implications, said that only two significant new exhibits were built using the bond money — the African Savannah and the Lemur Forest, completed in 2004 and 2002 respectively.

A scheduled $13.4 million Great Ape Forest was deferred from the list of projects. The zoo promised that project would "remain a fundraising goal for the SF Zoological Society," according to an update on the bond expenditures presented to the public in 2005. Orangutan and chimpanzee exhibits scheduled for improvement with the bond money were cancelled, the commission said, and the lone hippo was moved to an "arguably worse exhibit."

NICE RESTAURANT

Besides a new exhibit for grizzlies, habitations for the other bears "have not undergone any meaningful renovation," according to the commission.

And while the zoo spent the last decade downgrading projects promised to voters from the construction of new exhibits to the mere renovation of existing ones, others targeting the feel-good sensibilities of patrons that had little to do with actually caring for animals were completed as swiftly as possible.

The zoo's miniature train system, "Little Puffer," was fully restored with $700,000 worth of private funds in 1998. A $4 million education center, which doesn't actively house animals, was completed in 2001 using the bond money. A new entryway, improved streetscapes, parking, and a restaurant costing $20 million, which came largely from the zoo bonds, were completed two years late and $10 million over budget in 2002.

The renovation of an amusement ride for kids — the historic Dentzel Carousel — was also finished that year at a cost of more than $1 million. (Restorers spent almost 1,000 hours on each fake animal, according to the zoo's Web site.)

ments from the bond measure focused on visitor amenities, not improvements for the animals," the report states. "The Joint Zoo Committee and Recreation and Park Commission did not provide adequate oversight to ensure capital improvements made with bond money focused on animal enclosures and exhibits."

The report also points in part to a 1999 performance audit of the zoo conducted by San Francisco's respected budget analyst, Harvey Rose. The audit at that time argued that improving animal exhibits should come before building new gift shops and dining facilities, but that this recommendation was "not heeded," according to the commission.

"It was clear that none of that had been addressed," Mara Weiss, an animal welfare commissioner and veterinarian in the city, said of the 1999 audit.

Zoo officials received repeated invitations to attend recent commission meetings on the zoo, but they were mostly ignored. Weiss, however, acknowledged that the zoo was distracted by the tiger attack and resulting media circus.

'UTTERLY IMPOVERISHED'

Early this year, three zoo experts from abroad visited the San Francisco Zoo at the request of the group In Defense of Animals. Each sent a letter to the supervisors that decried the conditions in San Francisco. Robert Atkinson, a former Oxford University conservation, welfare researcher and one-time curator at the Woburn Safari Park in the United Kingdom, noted a failure "to adopt modern approaches to animal husbandry." Peter Stroud, a former zoo director from Australia, described the Black Rhinoceros exhibit as "utterly impoverished."

"It is in fact completely barren.... This exhibit conveys the general impression of a stock yard in which the interests of the animals are of no concern whatsoever," Stroud wrote.

The crown jewel of the zoo's animal habitations constructed using bond money, the African Savanna, was completed in 2004. It features giraffes, zebras, kudus — a species of antelope — and a bird aviary. But even that exhibit, the welfare commission argues, has problems.

"The new African Savanna exhibit was located in the most weather-exposed part of the zoo, and constructed without shelter or wind-breaks for the warm-weather animals displayed there," the report states. "In fact, the most sheltered part of the African Savanna exhibit was designed for the human visitors, leaving the animals who live there exposed to the cold wind and fog off the ocean just across the street."

We tried to reach the zoo for comment, but an administrative assistant told us that spokesperson Paul Garcia recently left his job there and a replacement wasn't available for questions. Another spokesperson was out of town. We were told that Bob Jenkins, the zoo's director of animal care, might return our call but he never did.

Jim Lazarus, a former zoo executive and current rec and park commissioner, said the zoo had to devote significant funds to its entrance to comply with the Americans with Disabilities Act. In addition, he said, the cost of construction materials globally has ballooned since 1997.

"None of this money goes as far as originally thought with the worldwide demand for steel and concrete....

We need a multiyear plan, both in terms of priority construction and a capital campaign funding strategy, to complete the half of the zoo that hasn't been renovated and that should be our goal," Lazarus said. "It's a wonderful facility."

But future projects planned for the zoo appear to continue the emphasis on visitors. A wish list of projects from the zoo's 2007 master plan update includes adding new conference spaces and retail, improving areas for family activities, creating a 1,000-seat amphitheater, installing yet another new café, and possibly a full-service restaurant called Windows on the Pacific.

The commission, however, has proposed that the zoo become a haven for saving animals rather than simply exhibiting them for the enjoyment of people. A rescue zoo, as they describe it, would provide a new home for exotic animals once held by private owners in inhumane conditions. Zoo veterinarians and other staff already possessing experience treating sick animals would naturally fit into the new concept, and the zoo's past conservation efforts, like programs for eagles and wild cats, could be grandfathered in.

Deniz Bolbol, a co-coordinator of the Bay Area-based Citizens for Cruelty-Free Entertainment and supporter of the rescue zoo idea, describes the joint committee that oversees the zoo as a rubber stamp and says, "everything the zoo proposes is approved; everything is unanimous."

"The Board of Supervisors really needs to reform the zoo at its base," Bolbol said.

The other zoo: sfzoo.org parodies the privatized zoo.

Lazarus opposes the idea of a rescue concept because he believes it won't generate enough revenue to keep the zoo self-sufficient. Sup. Sean Elsbernd, whose district includes the zoo, was also cool to the idea, saying no one has an idea of how much it might actually cost. Discussions at the board about how the $48 million in bond money was spent, in the meantime, would likely take a back seat to the lingering city-wide $338 million budget deficit.

Besides, he said, the zoo's new Grizzly Gulch, where two bears that were close to being euthanized by Montana wildlife officials live, represents what the commission is asking for.

"In concept, it's a great idea," Elsbernd said. "In concept, I also support every street being repaved every year. But there's reality. There was no realism in their report that showed us how to achieve [a rescue zoo] in the means that we have."

The operating agreement between the Zoological Society and the city comes up for renewal in June. SFBG

By nearly every measure, the Service Employees International Union has become a juggernaut. As the rest of organized labor has seen its share of the American workforce continue to dwindle, SEIU has brought in some 800,000 new dues-paying members in recent years. With the Democratic Party taking over Congress in 2006, the 1.9 million-member organization, rich with campaign funds, wields enormous political clout, and it will only become more formidable if Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama wins the White House in November.

But all is not well inside the labor giant. Andy Stern, the union's president, has pushed hard for merging and consolidating local chapters into larger operations — and many SEIU members, especially here on the West Coast, say that's turning the union into a top-down autocracy in which Stern loyalists wield undue influence and meddling officials from Washington, DC squelch dissent.

And now, the Guardian has learned, Stern operatives are using their money and organizing clout in a hard-hitting campaign — not to force an employer to the table or to toss out an anti-union politician, but to discredit another labor leader.

The campaign is part of a bruising power struggle between Stern and dissident local leader Sal Rosselli, who runs the Oakland-based SEIU affiliate United Health Care Workers West. In the past few months, union insiders say, SEIU officials, including a senior assistant to Stern, set up what one leader called a "skunk team" to undermine Rosselli's efforts at winning key union delegate elections. At one point, the team — which involved a political consulting firm linked to big downtown businesses — discussed an opposition research file compiled on Rosselli by a health-care giant his union was fighting.

And leading up to the delegate elections last month, SEIU staffers worked to promote Stern-supporting candidates, possibly in violation of union rules, while actively discouraging other union employees from campaigning. That's led to a formal complaint alleging improper involvement by Stern's staff in a local union election.

EMERGING TENSIONS

In 2005, Thomas Dewar went to work as a press secretary at Local 790, formerly SEIU's biggest San Francisco outlet, which represented approximately 30,000 workers, most of them public employees. Local 790 was among the most politically progressive union shops in the country, supporting left-leaning candidates for office and progressive causes like public

A less perfect union

At a time when organized labor is slipping, SEIU's national leaders are wasting their resources trying to discredit Sal Rosselli power. In early 2007, Andy Stern initiated a merger of 790 with nine other regional locals. The move was part of a larger consolidation in the state that saw the number of California union affiliates reduced by nearly half.

The new Northern California superlocal was dubbed 1021, as in "10 to one." Local 1021 has continued 790's liberal activism. But right after the merger was finalized, Dewar and other sources told the Guardian, the atmosphere around the union changed for the worse.

"A lot of members had anxiety," Dewar recounted. Most troubling, he said, was the insertion of Stern appointees into leadership positions, including current president Damita Davis-Howard. "Members were upset. They saw co-workers whom they had elected unilaterally removed by a guy in DC and replaced by his handpicked appointments."

Ed Kinchley, a Local 1021 member who was appointed by Stern to the local's executive board after the consolidation, shared Dewar's memory of the tensions. "You had 10 different locals with 10 different ways of doing things. It's difficult to merge all of that. A lot of people who had been elected to leadership positions were removed."

Dewar told us he struggled to adjust to his new working environment. But after his initial misgivings, he said he devoted himself to backing Stern's vision for the combined local: "We were told over and over that change is hard. So I decided to give it an honest shot." Dewar said he worked to get good press for 1021 and to build Davis-Howard's profile.

But early this year, tensions between Rosselli and Stern flared — and according to Dewar, top staffers at 1021 began to focus more and more of their attention on the feud. "They were freaking out about Sal," he said.

Enraged at what he considered International meddling in the affairs of his Oakland-based local, United Healthcare Workers West, Rosselli resigned from SEIU's executive committee in early February. He also began championing a "Platform for Change" to be voted on at the upcoming SEIU convention in June. Among other things, the Rosselli-backed slate of reforms would give local union outlets more say in proposed mergers and collective bargaining agreements. The platform, if approved, would also scrap the current delegate system for electing International officials and replace it with a one-member, one-vote structure.

According to Dewar's account and to evidence obtained by the Guardian, top SEIU officials have been working overtime to counter Rosselli — even pushing the boundaries of the union's own rules and colluding with political consultants who have often opposed organized labor.

'THE ANTI-CHRIST'

In early March, Dewar said that in early March, Josie Mooney, a former Local 790 president who is now a top assistant to Stern, approached him about joining what she characterized as a "skunk team that Andy and I are putting together." Dewar recalls Mooney telling him that the purpose of the team was to counter Rosselli's increasing popularity with the rank and file, and to sink Rosselli's platform for the convention.

Dewar told us that Mooney asked him to join the skunk team during a brunch meeting at the Fog City Diner in early March. An e-mail exchange he shared with us shows that he and Mooney discussed having brunch at the diner on March 1.

Mooney did not return numerous calls for comment and, through an SEIU spokesperson, she declined to speak for this article. But Dewar told us Mooney promised him at the brunch that his assistance in her efforts would win him positive attention from Stern. The team, she reportedly told him, was directly authorized by Stern and "that resources would not be a problem."

Dewar said he vacillated about joining the team, torn about aiding what he considered to be an internal union smear squad. "In 1021, we're conditioned to think that Sal Rosselli is the anti-Christ," Dewar told us. "But even still, he was still a part of the same union." A March 4 e-mail from Mooney's SEIU e-mail account to Dewar shows her urging Dewar to make up his mind: "You have to give me your commitment. I am (as we speak) selling you at the highest levels. Don't blow that :)." Dewar eventually agreed to join.

Mooney, Tom DeBruin — an elected vice president of SEIU International — and someone Dewar said Mooney referred to as the team's "silent partner" for a dinner meeting.

E-mails from Mooney and other attendees show that the meeting took place March 10 at Oliveto Restaurant in Oakland.

Mooney's "silent partner" turned out to be Mark Mosher, of the enormously successful San Francisco consulting firm, Barnes, Mosher, Whitehurst, Lauter, and Partners (BMWL). John Whitehurst, another of the firm's partners, also attended the dinner.

BMWL has worked for the SEIU since 2001. But its client roster also included Sutter Health and the Committee on Jobs. Both organizations have less-than-stellar reputations among organized labor. Nurses at 10 Bay Area Sutter hospitals recently walked off the job for a 10-day strike. The Committee on Jobs is one of the largest lobbying organizations for downtown San Francisco business interests and has fought against numerous union causes. Mosher told the Guardian by phone that, as of November of last year, the Committee is no longer a BMWL client.

THE ROSSELLI FILE

Dewar claims Sal Rosselli was the central topic of conversation at the dinner. At one point, he says, the participants discussed an "oppo research" file on Rosselli compiled by Sutter Health. The hospital giant has clashed repeatedly with Rosselli and apparently had sought to dig up dirt on him.

Whitehurst worked for Sutter in the 1990s. His efforts for the hospital chain during a ballot campaign in 1997 earned him a place on the California Labor Federation's "do not patronize" list.

Mosher confirmed by phone that Rosselli's file at Sutter did in fact come up at Oliveto that evening. But he said Dewar "bailed" him and Whitehurst into discussing it. Furthermore, he said, Whitehurst reported that Rosselli's file was "clean."

In fact, a March 12, 2008 e-mail from Dewar to Mosher suggests that the team focus on Rosselli's "hypocrisy" and states, "Have we approached anyone at Sutter re: dirt on Sal? Have we been able to peek into their oppo file?"

CONTINUES ON PAGE 14 >>

Ed Kinchley, SEIU member and Local 1021 executive board member. Kinchley was one of several 1021 members who filed a formal protest against alleged rule-breaking by union officials in a recent delegate election.

Later that day Mosher replied, "John Whitehurst read Sutter's whole oppo file on Sal in 1997." In a follow-up message, Mosher writes that the file "really supports the idea that he's not motivated by money."

DeBruin did not return calls for comment. Kami Lloyd, communications coordinator for Sutter, disputed whether the oppo file even existed: "To my knowledge," she told us, "no such file exists at Sutter Health."

Reached for comment, Rosselli reacted angrily to news of the alleged "skunk team" and the fact that a research file on him, compiled by a corporation perceived to be anti-union, was being discussed among SEIU officials. "It's shocking. It's treasonous. For Andy Stern to be using our members' dues money to finance [a smear] campaign against his own members in United Healthcare Workers, it's fundamentally anti-union."

Mosher defended his firm's involvement with SEIU. He told us that he and Whitehurst were "not brought on board to do negative things against Sal Rosselli." Instead, he said their mission has been to help tout the union's accomplishments as it prepares to hold its convention from June 1-4 in Puerto Rico.

SEIU spokesman Andy McDonald echoed Mosher's description of the firm's duties. Both Mosher and McDonald brought up the fact that Whitehurst has also worked for Rosselli's UHW union.

UHW's Paul Kumar confirmed that Whitehurst is currently "on our payroll" to assist in a dispute against Sutter Health — the very company Whitehurst worked for in the 1990s and the same source that provided him with access to Rosselli's research file. "These guys [BMW] claim they are trying to reinvent themselves," Kumar said. "But to be on our payroll and to engage directly in executing a dirty tricks program ... is about the most blatant violation of professional ethics I can imagine."

Whitehurst did not return calls for comment.

Dewar claimed he urged Mooney and the other attendees of the March 10 dinner to consider "appropriating" Rosselli's democratic reforms. "The members would all wildly support it. And that way, if the International co-opted Rosselli's ideas, then [the internal conflict] really would be about this clash of personalities, Rosselli versus Stern, instead of ideas." According to Dewar, Mosher and Whitehurst were receptive to the proposal to co-opt Rosselli's initiatives, but that "Josie nixed it."

When we asked Mosher if he remembered this exchange from the meeting, he said his memory was "hazy" and that "a lot was being discussed that night."

Although Dewar was, by his own account, an active participant in the skunk team, he says he started to have second thoughts. The dinner at Oliveto, Dewar said, and the discussion of Sutter's file on Rosselli, "made me want to take a shower ... the cynicism I was exposed to was toxic."

One week later, he sent Mooney an e-mail informing her that, "Today's my last day at SEIU ... the circular firing squads that are now forming in the local and in SEIU nationally have left me jaded, stressed out, and depressed."

SEIU's McDonald denied that the skunk team exists, or ever existed. He added that "the meeting [at Oliveto] was about talking about how [Mosher] could help SEIU communicate our message ... within the context of the misinformation campaign being spread by Sal Rosselli and UHW's leaders."

OUTSIDE INFLUENCE

The rancor between Rosselli and Stern has reached a boiling point in recent weeks. In compiling this story, we had to wade through reams of documents and endure long expatiations from officials and press flaks about the sins of the other side. Both factions have constructed slick, professional-looking Web sites to question the probity of their rivals, and both have coined kitschy names for their respective policy initiatives. The SEIU has countered Rosselli's "Platform for Change" with what union leaders call a "Justice for All" platform.

But the internecine struggle may have driven Josie Mooney and other high-level SEIU staffers to do much more than vent about Rosselli or seek dirt on him from political consultants. E-mails obtained by the Guardian suggest that she and other SEIU officials worked to influence an important local delegate election last month — possibly in violation of union rules — and, some union members now allege, in violation of federal law.

Delegates selected in the election will attend the union's international convention in June and will decide between the Rosselli's "Change" and Stern's "Justice" platforms. The outcome of that vote, and others like it, will shape the mammoth labor organization's future for years to come. And the e-mails appear to show a concerted effort by Mooney and Stern loyalists to ensure that Rosselli's dissidents don't stack the convention and push through their set of reforms.

Referring to themselves in the e-mails as the "Salsa Team," SEIU staffers discussed strategy and coordinated campaign activity for the delegate election with high-ranking union officials like Mooney and Damita Davis-Howard, the president of Local 1021, the e-mails show. In a formal complaint, some members charge that these activities violated Local 1021's Election Rules and Procedures — specifically Rule 18, which states that "while in the performance of their duties, union staff shall remain uninvolved and neutral in relation to candidate endorsements and all election activities."

While Rule 18 does not specifically spell out when union staff can advocate for candidates, other than proscribing such activities "while in performance of their duties," the e-mails in our possession are date- and time-stamped, and at least one was sent during normal business hours. Furthermore, the Guardian has obtained an internal memo from Local 1021 official (and apparent Salsa Team member) Patti Tamura in which she warned union staffers that the phrase "performance of their duties" goes beyond [Monday through Friday] and 9-5p."

One Local 1021 official who asked not to be identified told us that Tamura's memo appeared to be a clear message that staff should stay completely out of the election. "They made it perfectly clear to the lower staff that your employment doesn't stop [after hours]; you're still staff. That means you don't get involved. But now it turns out they themselves were doing it. That's a double standard ... it's certainly not right."

The messages between Salsa Team members show them actively working to recruit potential delegates sympathetic to Stern's platform and to aid Davis-Howard in her bid to represent the union at the June convention. One missive, dated Feb. 18, which appears to come from the personal e-mail account of Local 1021 employee Jano Oscherwitz and was sent to what appear to be the personal accounts of Tamura and Mooney, requests that a "message for Damita" be drafted.

A forwarded e-mail from that same day, from Oscherwitz to what appear to be personal e-mail accounts for Tamura, fellow 1021 staffer Gilda Valdez, and "Damita" includes a "Draft Message" with bulleted talking points, apparently for Davis-Howard to use as she "Collect[s] Signatures on Commitment Cards."

"Commitment cards" refers to pledges from union members to support certain delegates.

The e-mails go beyond merely aiding Davis-Howard and other Stern-backed candidates. They also include detailed strategy for opposing Rosselli and countering his message. A March 5 Salsa Team message includes an attached document with several talking points critical of the dissident leader. In the body of the e-mail, SEIU staffer Gilda Valdez advises Davis-Howard, Mooney, 1021 Chief of Staff Marion Steeg, and others to "Memorize the points in talking to folks." Valdez goes on to say in the e-mail that she "will be calling ... about your assignments."

Reached for comment, Davis-Howard confirmed that the AOL e-mail account listed as "Damita" was hers. But she claimed no knowledge of the Salsa Team or the messages sent to her. "If you're saying those e-mails went to my home computer, who knows if I ever even got them?"

Davis-Howard bristled at the suggestion that the Salsa Team's activities violated union rules. "Are you trying to tell me that I can never campaign? Does it [Rule 18] say that I have to be neutral and uninvolved 24 hours a day?"

Calls to Mooney, Oscherwitz, Valdez, and Tamura were not returned. Through an SEIU spokesman, Mooney declined to comment.

A BAD AFTERTASTE

On April 4, three days after the Guardian first reported on the Salsa Team e-mails on our Web site, Sanchez and several other 1021 officials filed a formal complaint with the union's election committee. In the complaint, they accuse Davis-Howard and the other team members of violating Rules 10 and 18 of the union's election codes. Rule 10 forbids "the use of union and employer funds ... to support any candidate."

Local 1021 executive board member and Stern appointee Ed Kinchley authored part of the complaint. According to the text, which was obtained by the Guardian, Kinchley wrote, "While telling other staff that they may be for any intervention in this election, Ms. Davis-Howard and the others involved secretly did exactly what they told other staff they were forbidden from doing."

The complaint was signed by 16 Local 1021 officials, including numerous members of the local's executive board. It called on the election committee to remove Davis-Howard "from the elected Delegate list" and to bar Salsa Team members from attending the convention in June.

The issue also has landed in federal court, where UHW was expected to file against Stern and other SEIU officials, alleging interference in delegate elections.

More cynical sources both inside and outside SEIU told us they believe the Rosselli-Stern feud boils down to one thing: power — either holding onto or expanding it. But labor scholar and former Local 790 member Paul Johnston had a more nuanced perspective.

Johnston, who taught at Yale and, until recently, worked for the Monterey Bay Labor Council, told us he admired both leaders and the work each has done on behalf of the larger union. Calling the current strife "a huge can of worms," he added, "These are questions of principle and there are good ideas on both sides."

Stern's push to increase the union's bargaining and political clout through more consolidation, Johnston went on, "has some very positive aspects to it.... In the old days, many of these kind of mergers were done for purely political power. The mergers being conducted today [at Stern's direction] are primarily strategic, though. But there are some power issues that inevitably arise." On the other hand, he said, Rosselli's UHW, "is a dynamic organizing union that has [its] own issues." —SFG

The 100-yard diet

By Nicole Gluckstern

► news@sfbg.com

GREEN CITY Locavorism — the practice of eating only or mostly food raised with a 100-mile distance — has been a hot trend the past couple of years. It's a concept that makes a lot of sense — even organic food grown hundred or thousands of miles away can hardly be considered sustainable once you figure in the resources used to ship it.

But a committed breed of urban farmers is challenging even the 100-mile definition of local food. These folks are cultivating their own cornucopia in their backyards and community garden plots, pruning their own fruit trees, raising their own chickens....

Hold on a minute. Chickens? In the city?

It's true. Not only is it possible to raise your own small brood (four or less) in San Francisco, but it's less labor intensive and materially more rewarding than caring for your household pets. Do you need to take a chicken out for walks? No. Does your Chihuahua lay eggs? No.

And you can expect to reap more than just eggs from your new feathered friends. As Walter Parenteau of the Panhandle puts it, "Chickens fill an important spot in the cycle of a sustainable backyard." From their nitrogen-rich manure (an excellent catalyst for compost) to their enthusiasm for pest control, chickens earn their keep — even without the dozen eggs a week you'll get from each pair of first-year layers.

A major issue for raising chickens in your backyard is space. In San Francisco, the city's Department of Public Health requires that chicken coops be situated at least 20 feet from all buildings — which rules out keeping chickens on your patio or in your living room. Chickens also need space to thrive in: their run should ideally provide a minimum of four square feet per chicken and include a predator-proof covering of chicken wire or nonmetallic "poultry netting," which also will prevent escapees (contrary to popular belief, chickens can fly, albeit clumsily and infrequently).

A fully enclosed chicken coop built of sturdier materials — plywood or bamboo — is also necessary. Interior nesting boxes should be about one square foot big — just large enough for one chicken. For cleanliness and insulation, a thick layer of straw or hay should be scattered over all the surfaces and changed every couple of months. The old, excrement-laden material can then be composted immediately.

The other main consideration for urban chickens is protection from predators.

"We never saw raccoons in our garden until they discovered we had chickens," says Walter, a San Francisco chicken farmer. "But when they did, we saw them in there every night for three weeks." The unwelcome visitors' persistence finally paid off when the coop was left unlocked, and the coons made off with one of two hens.

Brian W., who raised chickens for 10 years in the Bayview District, also cites hawks as a major threat to chickens living in uncovered runs, and says that rats are attracted to unclean or unsupervised coops.

"You have to think hard about how you're going to shelter your chickens from predators," agrees Paul Glowaski, who teaches workshops on raising urban poultry at SF's Garden for the Environment. "You might need to get creative with your space."

These considerations aside, city-dwelling chicken farmers remain overwhelmingly positive about their experiences. Inexpensive to feed (kitchen scraps, garden snails, and cracked corn play the biggest dietary roles) and content, for the most part, with entertaining themselves, backyard birds provide a gentle gateway experience for novices to animal husbandry. They offer benefits to the ecology of their environment, and help restore a connection to the food production chain. Chickens are the missing link to perfecting what Novella Carpenter of Oakland calls "the 100-yard diet." Even as a hobby, raising chickens can impart an irresistible element of eco-chic to their respective owners.

"At the end of the day, you get to be the 'guy with chickens in his backyard,'" Walter says. "And that can be a lot of fun." SFBG

Pregnant men

By Annalee Newitz
 > annalee@techsploitation.com

TECHSPLOITATION

Beattie is actually not the first man to get pregnant. Almost a decade ago, a San Francisco transgendered man named Matt Rice got pregnant and had a cute son. Several years after that, I met another pregnant transman in San Francisco. He was telling his story, with his wife, at a feminist open mic. So why is Beattie getting all the credit, and why now?

Beattie is the first pregnant man most people will ever meet. He's the guy in People magazine right now looking preggers and hunky, and the guy who was on the Oprah Winfrey Show last week. And it makes sense that he's the first wonder of tranny obstetrics medical science to hit the spotlight. He's a nice, small-town Oregon boy, married for five years to a nice, small-town lady, and his full beard and muscles make it quite obvious that he's a dude. In other words: he's not a freak from a freaky city like San Francisco. He is, as they say in the mainstream media, relatable.

And he's playing his poster boy role perfectly. On Oprah, you could tell he was a friendly, shy person (albeit with a black belt in karate). Visibly nervous, obviously proud as hell of his wife and soon-to-be-born daughter, he didn't try to make a political statement or lecture anybody about gender binaries being stupid. He had a hard time explaining why he had become a man, too. Often when Oprah asked pointed questions he would shrug and say, "It's hard to explain." Exactly like a dude to be sort of inarticulate about his own dude-ness. So another part of his appeal to the mainstream media is that he fits gender stereotypes.

Plus, he's the guy every woman wants to marry. Not only is he cute and happy to build things around the house, he's willing to have your baby for you too. As Beattie's wife said to Oprah with a grin, "What woman wouldn't want her husband to get pregnant?"

So we know the answers to the "Why Beattie?" part. Every new minority needs a friendly, relatable poster child: lesbians have Ellen, and I suppose you could say mixed-race people have Barack Obama. The real question is: why now? Or even: can it happen now?

In some ways, those are the same questions people are asking about a possible Obama presidency. Can the majority of people in the United States accept a mixed-race guy in a role previously reserved for white dudes? To return to the issue of Beattie, can the majority accept a man taking on a role (pregnant dad) they'd never contemplated before, except when watching a bad Arnold Schwarzenegger sci-fi comedy called Junior?

I think they can, but not for the same reasons they might accept Obama. Beattie is not a political creation like Obama — he's the creation of medical technology, pure and simple. Hormones and surgery made him male. Artificial insemination made him pregnant. There would have been no way to accept Beattie 10 years ago because he literally could not have existed. But contemporary medical technology has given us a chance.

Considering Beattie in that context — as the release version of a new kind of biotech-enabled man — makes it clear why this is happening now.

Of course, social changes have a lot to do with his emergence into the public spotlight. Gender roles are shifting, and it's often hard to say what it means anymore to be a "real man" or a "real woman." The vast majority of people may have a common-sense definition of masculine and feminine, but even those definitions have changed a lot over the past 50 years.

So maybe medical technology is just now catching up with cultural shifts, or maybe cultural shifts are pushing us to use technologies we've had for a while in new gender-blurring ways. All I know is that biotechnology is making theories of gender fluidity concrete, making ideas into flesh. And we're seeing a pattern that always emerges when we're right on the edge of accepting a big social change. First, the ideas turn into something real that people can touch — or, in the case of Beattie, talk to. And then comes the next phase. Whatever that may be. SFBG

By Johnny Ray Huston
johnny@sfbg.com

I was skeptical about live cinema until I walked into Anthony McCall's You and I, Horizontal and its white light and darkness sent me somewhere far beyond — and deeper than — any zone occupied by a movie or piece of visual art. Of course, the folks at SF Cinematheque have long been believers in live cinema. They're publishing a book on the subject, edited by Thomas Beard, that includes pieces on projection performances, vintage video game-inspired antics, and two chapters devoted to the viscerally inventive Bruce McClure. A party for a book on the subject has to have some live cinema, and the masters of non sequitur, Animal Charm, are among those doing the honors.

San Francisco Women's Film Festival Opening Night

His name was Joe Johnson, but I had the feeling that the Sallie Mae representative who spoke to me over the phone in an Indian accent probably went by something else when he wasn't calming the nerves of irate, indebted Americans. I didn't know what to be angry at — the rising costs of college? Or capitalism, whereby folks have to literally change their identities to make a buck? Complex questions like these are at the heart of the San Francisco Women's Film Festival. Nalini by Day, Nancy by Night (2005), directed by Sonali Gulati, explores the outsourcing of American telephone jobs to India and recolonization in the form of adopting Western names. VISUAL ART

"Burlesque: Photographs by Robert Adler"

Robert Adler's burlesque photographs date from 1974 — a time when burlesque was fully giving way to topless bars and strip clubs. They are set in Adler's hometown of Philadelphia, at the Troc Burlesque Theater, a dusty old movie theater that had been endlessly refashioned but never truly remodeled. The ghosts of cinema past and future are present in Adler's photos. In their dramatic and lonely use of space and shades of gray, they eerily predate the look of fellow Pennsylvania resident David Lynch's first feature film, 1977's Eraserhead. But as the notes on his Web site illustrate, Adler never loses sight of his human subjects and their stories. As part of the opening reception for this show, he'll sign copies of a Burlesque monograph at Bacchus Wine Bar at 1954 Hyde Street, across from the gallery. (Huston)

Dälek

Pioneers of a gritty, industrial brand of hip-hop duo Dälek — consisting of Oktopus and MC Dälek — approach their craft with a take-it-or-leave-it mentality and a refreshingly innovative spirit. "Never write my songs for consumers / Ironic 'cause I write for heads with fat laces on they Pumas," the Newark-based MC spits on "Corrupt (Knuckle Up)," a track from 2007's Abandoned Language (Ipecac). "Traveled under soil with Osiris / Birth and death of modern world on the Tigris," they presciently proclaim on "Tarnished." The anarchic cacophony of screaming strings, experimental synths, banging drums, and militant rhymes that define so many of their songs are as cold and bleak as a Brick City winter, yet there's a cohesiveness that transcends the chaos. Graffiti artists are the ultimate visionaries — I mean, they were blogging even before Al Gore invented the Internet. Think about it: what's the difference between painting on a concrete public wall and putting writing, artwork, or pictures of your penis on a virtual, even more public one? Screen names replace tag names, but the dangerous allure of anonymous exhibitionism remains the same. The documentary Bomb It explores the fascinating world of street art from its history to its international role today. Anti Nowhere League

"Another boring night and I'm feeling pissed / My head's fucked up and I'm in a mess / Too many drugs, they make me high / I wanna cause havoc, I wanna die." You have no idea how revelatory, and how reassuring, these words — from the Anti Nowhere League anthem "We're the League" — could be to a eighth-grade outcast and budding alchymist trapped in a shitty suburban town surrounded by cool kids who hated him. I used to type the lyrics to "So What," all about humping farm animals, shooting dope, and drinking pints of piss, and leave them on the screen of the Commodore Vic 20 in the computer lab. The League, led by the fearless, freaked-out, bondage biker Animal, have been assaulting morals and common decency since they formed in England in 1980. They were arrested at their first gig and had all the copies of their debut album, the classic We Are... the League (WXYZ, 1982), confiscated by a force only the Brits could cook up with a straight face: the Obscene Publications Squad. In my coastal SoCal home town, surfers were the tanned demigods of my teenage lust, which is why I've seen Point Break (1991) 77 million times. I also watched it for the awesome surfing scenes, crazy skydiving sequence, and Bodhi and Johnny Utah's complicated relationship, which rivals the Lechter-Starling dynamic in erotic, Svengali-esque undertones. Point Break Live!, playing at the Xenodrome, is an absurdist stage adaptation of Point Break. Johnny is selected from the audience each night — to capture the “rawness” of a Keanu performance — and reads the entire script off cue cards. Love for the film aside, I'm just going to witness some I.T. guy say, “Vaya con dios, brah.” (Sankur)

CULT DVDS In the last drive-in heyday of the 1970s, before home video's death-thrust, possibly no distributor label was more ubiquitous under the beery make-out stars of outdoor cinema than Crown International Pictures.

There's little documentation to be found about Crown beyond its start as a purchaser of cheap US indie-genre flicks, nudie cuties (including 1965's immortal, Ed Wood-penned Orgy of the Dead), and marketably naughty imports. And the '60s really started swinging, however, Crown elbowed right into the leading exploitation pack with biker titles (not least, the 1971 ersatz gay-power opus The Pink Angels); horror (1976's Satan's Slave); martial arts (1974's Kung Fu Mama); blaxploitation (Jamaa Fariaka's mind-boggling 1975 Welcome Home Brother Charles) — and a whole lotta basic chixploitation.

That nondescript Crown logo guaranteed you'd get some violence, melodrama, and as much sexual pleasure (or peril) as an R rating would bear. The titles speak for themselves: 1973's Superchick, 1971's Chain Gang Women, 1975's Las Vegas Lady, 1976's Hustler Squad ("Their orders: LOVE your enemy ... then KILL HIM!"), and so on.

For many Middle Americans, Southerners, small-towners, underagers, and the simply unhip — i.e., the majority — these films were the spiciest available expression of that fabled sexual revolution. With viewer attention primarily focused on petting and smoking bud, these films enjoyed looser genre demands than actual porn or even mainstream Hollywood features. Thus there's a wide divergence to the content and tenor of vintage '70s Crown releases collected in the new discount DVD set Drive-In Cult Classics (Navarre Corporation).

Tripindicular Tarot readings, biker-psychos, and closeted love can be found in Drive-In Cult Classics (top), a compendium of vintage '70s genre flicks by Crown (bottom).

Despite that tepid title, this Me Decade-spanning eight-pack gives you beaucoup retro weirdness — not to mention sideburns and flute rock — for your ten bucks.

Future major-league director Joseph Ruben (2004's The Forgotten) got an auspicious if obscure start with misleadingly titled 1974 Sister-in-Law. It's mostly about fraternal affection-slash-betrayal between one brother fresh off the hippie trail (adorable pre-Deer Hunter John Savage, who also contributes the fey Elton John-like song score), his elder a famous author in deep trouble with the Mob. It's arty psychodrama with a potent, bitter ending.

Even harder to imagine kids grooving on at the drive-in is the next year's Pick Up, a deep-dyed Aquarian Age relic that's light on narrative coherency yet heavy on reality v. illusion allegory, Wiccan chicks, slo-mo traipsing through wildflowers, and ominous Tarot readings. Twippy!

But there's nothing psychedelic 'bout 1975's Trip with the Teacher, as four mature-looking "school-girls" and one prim chaperone are kidnapped by one of the era's great manic biker-psychos (future billowing-curtain softcore auteur Zalman King, producer of 1986's 9 1/2 Weeks and the Red Shoe Diaries series). By contrast, Angel Tompkins, (playing the title role in 1974's The Teacher, cheerfully seduces a barely-former student (TV's Dennis the Menace, Jay North), drawing wrath from her own crazy psycho-stalker guy.

Mental illness seems a running thread here. Best Friends, 1975's double-date roadrip, hinges on the pathologically closeted love Pat (Doug Chapin) feels for fellow ex-Army mate Jesse (Richard Hatch from the original Battlestar Galactica). It's A Separate Peace meets Easy Rider. Malibu High (1979) has feather-haired, academically lazy high schooler Kim (Jill Lansing) ruthlessly determined to graduate with honors or else — whether it takes screwing faculty or assassinating them.

We shouldn't slight 1970's Cindy and Donna, the "hardest" (originally X-rated) feature here, and a wonderful encapsulation of a pre-hardcore era's typical lascivious moralizing. We should slight 1972's The Stepmother, a turgid potboiler that was astonishingly nominated for an Oscar for theme song "Strange Are the Ways of Love." But anything that brings together The Flying Nun's Alejandro Rey, '70s Gator Bait drive-in goddess Claudia Jennings, and pre-*M*A*S*H*' Larry Linville must be seen once.

Sustaining via direct-to-video product through the 1980s, Crown was played out by the early '90s. Still, its peak years no doubt planted more than a few indelible if foggy memories. Imagine being jolted from your stoned backseat third-basing by this Sister-in-Law nugget: "Edward, listen to me — I've had your wife and your mistress, and I threw your heroin into a mountain stream!" How are rock's highly touted troubadours faring? REM (left) supercharges their approach with Accelerate, the Rolling Stones (second from left with a sorry Christina Aguilera) fires up their live display, and Bruce Springsteen (second from right) gives us a reason to believe. And I do believe Enon (top right) is coming up fast April 13 at Bottom of the Hill (what, free donuts courtesy of Donuts?!), and Dirty Dozen Brass Band (bottom right) blows out the Independent on April 12. Dirty! | REM PHOTO BY CASS BIRD; ROLLING STONES PHOTO BY KEVIN MAZUR; BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN PHOTO BY DANNY CLINCH

Rock's future, decades along

By Kimberly Chun
kimberly@sfbg.com

SONIC REDUCER The money, the fame / And the public acclaim / Don't forget who you are / You're a rock and roll star." These bitter words by the Byrds roll over through my mind while watching the resurrection of three generations of rock hope realized — reappearing at a time when industry majors like Universal, Sony, and Warner Music are busy bowing to the social networking sphere, i.e., MySpace. The sands are shifting beneath the Rolling Stones, Bruce Springsteen, and REM, all bands I've waved my adoring fangirl flag for, all once toasted as the future of rock 'n' roll when the form was the sexiest game in town. Well, the future — along with the classic LPs, the heavily referenced and canonical tunes, the wives, the money-printing tours — has come and gone, so why not step back from an eyeballful of IMAX and think about whether such once-seemingly-ageless, now-clearly-aging mortals are holding the course or moving forward? Does size still matter?

Lord knows — and Sir Mick Jagger surely realizes — you can throw money at a prestige project: the new Stones-Martin Scorsese business partnership, Shine a Light, is proof. Sure, it's a decent, energized Stones performance — much better than their 2005 date at SBC Park — and certainly the band comes off well in their love for the music (Keith Richards) and artfulness (Mick Jagger). Ron Wood even gets off a nice solo or two. But why bother documenting a Stones live period — the "Bigger Bang" jaunt, otherwise known as the highest grossing tour of all time — essentially recognized for simply raking in a buttload of money for the band? Not only have the Stones been the subject of a much better concert film-documentary — the Maysles' Gimme Shelter (1970), which Scorsese bows to by enlisting Albert Maysles for some camerawork — but rock fan Scorsese has already made a much more multidimensional and affecting concert flick (The Last Waltz, 1978) and a more evocative and heartfelt documentary about a musical icon (No Direction Home, 2005).

Rather, the Stones appear to be recontextualizing their dirty blues-rock for a new, well-heeled generation that can afford them:

denuding "Sympathy for the Devil" of its menace and recasting it as a party anthem, far from the maddening Altamont crowd. Jagger's toned, dancer's physique looks downright expensive as he attempts to repurpose arena poses in the intimate Beacon Theatre, as pricey as Richards' Louis Vuitton ad and as well-fed as the scrubbed and fratty crowd down front in Shine a Light. Is such a display of power and funds sexier — or offensive — during a recession? Still, the last laugh seems to belong to the Stones: how else to read the final image of Shine a Light as the moon morphs into the Stones tongue than as, "See ya, suckers?"

Springsteen's aging, gray-tressed mob at HP Pavilion on April 5 would never tolerate such winking behavior. As earnest and idealistic in their Silicon Valley fleece and chinos as the so-called Next Dylan so many decades along, they yelled back at the holy rollers picketing the front of the Shark Tank — o demon rock "Born in the U.S.A." — and dutifully lowed, "Broooce!" after each song. Springsteen returned their devotion in kind with two and a half hours of superhuman passion that drew from new releases as well as from Darkness on the Edge of Town and The River (both Columbia; 1978, 1980).

Even as Broooce rocked "Reason to Believe," off Nebraska (Columbia, 1982), as a bluesy rave-up, or told stories of leaving wife Patti Scialfa at home to monitor their teenagers, his hard-working, well-meaning decency kept shining through. These days sax sidekick Clarence Clemons may find it necessary to sit out many songs on his throne/easy chair set to stage left and organist Danny Federici is sidelined by melanoma, but the leader still possesses a unflagging fire and expansive romanticism — even if it is spent stumping for Hillary Clinton as of late. On Saturday night, what was striking was less how indebted the latest long-players by younger artists like Arcade Fire and the Killers are to Broooce than the long arm of his influence on so much '80s radio rock: everyone from Don Henley to Patti Smith to the Pointer Sisters to John Mellencamp.

And whither goes the next greatest rock band, after Springsteen, to attain critical mass: REM? The combo drew kudos for their recent South by Southwest turn — and as with Broooce and the Stones, Michael Stipe, Mike Mills, and Peter Dinklage have chosen to grow louder with age, writing their new album on electric guitars rather than toning it down with dinner background Musak. More than 25 years into the band's history, REM's 14th album, Accelerate seems to plunk down in the Stones' tax bracket with the opening "Living Well Is the Best Revenge," if not for the clearly articulated, biting irony of Michael Stipe's lyric, "Baby I am calling you on that." Favoring rock 'n' roll blast in a compact 34 minutes, with only traces of the Velvety subtlety and Southern primitive melodicism I once treasured the band for, REM has instead picked up where "It's the End of the World as We Know It (And I Feel Fine)" left off, retuning its glib soothsaying for post-WTO riots, post-Katrina times, driving it through a pop filter, and sprinkling "Sympathy for the Devil" whoos on the closer, "I'm Gonna DJ." "Look at the world and see plenty of reasons to be angry," guitarist Peter Dinklage has said, describing Accelerate. We'll see if they still rage, live. SFBG

While their guitars gently weep

Stars of the Lid continually refines the mix

By Matt Sussman
 > a&cletters@sfbg.com

In the liner notes for his 1978 album, Ambient 1: Music for Airports (Editions EG/Polydor), Brian Eno wrote that the music contained within "must be as ignorable as it is interesting." Though that watershed release launched a thousand new age imitators under the banner of ambient music, Eno's ambivalent criteria still holds as a descriptive litmus test for any music that only partially depends on focused engagement in order to be fully appreciated.

Or as Adam Wiltzie, one half of the dreamy instrumental duo Stars of the Lid, puts it: "There is a narcoleptic feeling that I want to get within each tune. If the piece doesn't make me fall asleep, then it's probably not finished."

Wiltzie and musical partner Brian McBride have taken their time refining their soporific version of Eno's barely there aesthetic, releasing just a handful of beatless, slow-burning full-lengths during the past decade. Coming six years after their epic sophomore Kranky release, The Tired Sounds of (2001), last year's And Their Refinement of the Decline (Kranky) proved to be another gentle juggernaut: treated violin, cello, and fog-horn brass provided tonal counterpoints to the clouds of diaphanous guitars over the course of two hours. Given that the duo tours even less frequently than they put out new material — primarily due to the fact that Wiltzie and McBride now live on opposite sides of the Atlantic — their April 15 stopover at the Independent is the equivalent of catching a passing comet with the naked eye.

Eno is an obvious touchstone, although Wiltzie responds somewhat begrudgingly on the phone from Brussels when I bring up the comparison. "I grew up listening to Eno's ambient works and whether I liked them or not they must have influenced me somewhat," he explains. "But influences — and whether or not people hear this or that artist in our work — can be like a strange beauty pageant where everyone has their personal favorites."

Comfy and cozy even while settled on different sides of the Atlantic: Stars of the Lid make a rare appearance at the Independent. | PHOTO BY JOSHUA ROTTER

Granted, Eno's earlier ambient experiments on Music for Airports and Discreet Music (Editions EG, 1975) focused on creating systems that would self-generate infinite variations from prerecorded tape loops. SOTL is a far more compositionally oriented project, and many of Wiltzie's "personal favorites" are composers: Gavin Bryars, Arvo Part, Bernard Herrmann, and Alexandre Desplat. Their influence is clear. And Their Refinement sounds, well, refined compared to the rough-hewn compositions of earlier releases. On many tracks the strings and horns are upfront in the mix, and even then only lightly brushed with a wash of delay and soft EQ, while longer pieces, such as the 17-minute album closer, "December Hunting for Vegetarian Fuckface," are suites unto themselves.

"Maybe my classical music influences are showing more and more," Wiltzie suggests when I ask him about And Their Refinement's more delicate arrangements. "I also am on a lot less drugs than I used to be as a kid. Maybe I just have more clarity now," he laughs. "I'm just growing older, I guess."

What hasn't changed is the evocative power of SOTL's music, even as it tends to massage listeners into slumber. Perhaps it is the blank-canvas quality of ambient music that has made "cinematic" such an ubiquitous way to describe what's being heard (as prescient as ever, Eno's Music for Films [Editions EG, 1978] offered soundtracks for imaginary movies). No one ever hears a song the same way, yet SOTL's music touches a specific emotional range — one that is definitely in a minor key.

Case in point: And Their Refinement's "Don't Bother They're Here," a reverb-soaked gloss on the opening bars of Stephen Sondheim's maudlin ballad "Send in the Clowns." Stripping away the original's thick coating of show tune schmaltz, SOTL leave only a whispered trace of the lonely little melody at its center.

"We both love Judy Collins's version of that song. It's just a nod to beautiful melody," Wiltzie explains. "I've just wanted to create a beautiful sound that encapsulates a feeling of beauty and sadness in the same breath." sfba

MOTHERS OF INVENTION: BROOKLYN SAVANT-ROCKERS DIRTY PROJECTORS BLAZE A PATH LESS TRAVELED

In spite of music culture's constant craving for new waves and next-big-things, there are always those bands that do not how to any marketable bubble, the ones that skew the trends and equations of rock chronologies with their sui generis melds. After several albums of high-flying concepts, sheet music-necessitating technique, and stylistic miscegenation, Dave Longstreth's Dirty Projectors have firmly established themselves as such a group.

First conceived in New Haven, Conn., Longstreth's namesake went through many permutations before settling in Brooklyn as an elemental two guitars-bass-drums quartet. The current grouping plays the leader's chamber-rock compositions with fire and finesse. Bassist Angel Deradoorian and guitarist Amber Coffman's double-helix backup vocals leave Longstreth free to float his quivering voice and slash at his thin, West African-kissed guitar lines as if they were exclamations. Hypertuned and aerobic, a Dirty Projectors concert is a bold tonic of intellectualism and adrenaline.

I try to say as much to Longstreth when I catch him on the phone in Brooklyn, and he muses, "I kind of like feeling that that's a component of the feeling of the music ... [that] tension of the relatedness, or unrelatedness, of what our mouths are doing and what our fingers are doing." All of Longstreth's Dirty Projectors records are accordingly stretchy, though last year's Rise Above (Dead Oceans) is probably the most cohesive formulation of the project's intrinsic push-pull. The back story, well trod by now, is that Longstreth recovered a cassette case for Black Flag's hardcore LP, Damaged (SST, 1984) without the actual tape, and in a flight of Borgesian invention, set out on writing songs refracted by his memory of the original album.

Longstreth has indulged similarly sly threads before — 2005's The Getty Address (Western Vinyl) had something to do with Don Henley — though hardcore pieties meant Rise Above received more scrutiny than usual. "We got some really amazing hate mail on our MySpace page," Longstreth says, laughing. Hardly a straightforward tribute, Rise Above references the essential "no" of Black Flag's attack in both music and lyric, but inscribes the songs with double-consciousness-and-complexity rather than Greg Ginn's brute strength.

Syrupy strings introduce a snaky, sweet guitar line and a dirty disco bottom. Thundering female and male choruses overhang Longstreth's echoing verse before launching off for an oasis of backwards guitars and cymbals. This all happens a couple of minutes into "No More." Longstreth may think in fragments, but the resulting sound is one of passion, not math. His hot-blooded appreciation of pop and R&B — he mentions T-Pain and Chris Brown as two current interests — doesn't come with a smirk. Though these elements are mostly cloaked in convolution on Dirty Projectors recordings, Longstreth occasionally offers a more unobstructed view of his visionary soul music. The title track of Rise Above sounds almost newborn in its plaintive wail, and the same can be said for older tracks like "Not Having Found" from The Getty Address and "Unmoved" from Slaves' Graves and Ballads (Western Vinyl, 2004).

With all the rehashing of post-punk over the last several years, it's hard to imagine a more eloquent last word on the subject than Rise Above. When Longstreth looked back on an earlier era, it wasn't to revive something; it was to let it go, and then keep right on pushing ahead. When I ask Longstreth what he's been up to, he tells me he's been busy working through new material with the band for their upcoming tour. "The music's written with [them] in mind," he explains. "It's the first stuff I've done that's been like that." (Max Goldberg)

Done wanderin'

Jackie Greene finds life among the Dead

By Blair Jackson

> a&cletters@sfbg.com

It isn't easy being a Chosen One. Roots' singer-songwriter Jackie Greene — formerly a big fish in the relatively small pond of Sacramento, who now lives in San Francisco — has had great things expected of him since he was a solo troubadour fresh out of high school in Placerville. Rolling Stone critics named Gone Wanderin', his first album for the indie Dig Music label, one of the best of 2002 and the follow-up, Sweet Somewhere Bound (Dig Music, 2004), was another critical favorite. The excitement led to Greene being signed by Verve/Forecast, and his first disc for that company, 2006's extraordinary American Myth, seemed to confirm this guy was going places. Produced by Los Lobos' Steve Berlin, the album was a diverse and confident showcase of Americana styles, from blues to driving rock to Dylanesque rambles. But a not-so-funny thing happened to Greene on the way to certain stardom: his label started to fall apart in the middle of promoting his album, tours were cancelled, and the blush of early success faded.

Yet Greene's upward trajectory continued. A spellbinding and charismatic performer, he kept playing wherever he could, with his band or acoustic with a partner. It wasn't long before he had a new label in place, this time with 429, a subsidiary of the Savoy jazz imprint. In the meantime, out of the blue, former Grateful Dead bassist Phil Lesh, who leads the popular Deadish jam band Phil Lesh and Friends, fell in love with American Myth and invited Greene to join the group as lead vocalist and co-lead guitarist alongside the great Larry Campbell. Though Greene hadn't listened to much Dead beyond the records his parents owned — and frankly he preferred his folks' Ray Charles and Big Bill Broonzy discs — he quite naturally fell into the mix. The songwriter was quickly accepted by Dead Heads for his passionate renditions of the band's tunes, as well as cover songs and a sprinkling of his originals.

"I love playing in Phil and Friends," he says as he sits in the control room of Mission Bells, the Bernal Heights recording studio he shares with Tim Bluhm of the Mother Hips. "Playing those Jerry [Garcia] songs, I kind of feel like I love a lot of them like they're my own songs."

In the midst of touring with Lesh last fall, Greene and Steve Berlin somehow managed to find time to record the superb, just-released Giving up the Ghost (429). Using both his regular touring band and the same group of hip Los Angeles session cats who sparked American Myth — collectively they're known as Jackshit, with Elvis Costello drummer Pete Thomas as their best-known member — Greene and Berlin painstakingly put together the album from sessions in Sacramento, SF, Los Angeles, Chicago, and Brooklyn. Greene rightly calls the recording "darker" than its predecessor. That said, it is still filled with sharp lyrics, bright melodies, memorable riffs and hooks, and typically soulful vocals. In keeping with Greene's and Berlin's affection for off-the-wall sonics, there are literally dozens of different guitar and keyboard textures, unusual treatments on vocals, and a zillion little touches that give the disc a wonderful variety and depth. It's easy to picture several songs being embraced by rock radio, but this music is still not exactly at the forefront of the current mainstream.

"Certainly I want to have some successful records — who doesn't?" Greene confesses. "But I'm not willing to make anything other than what I want to make it sound like. If this is not considered commercially viable, then so be it." SFBC

GNARLS BARKLEY
The Odd Couple
(Downtown/Atlantic)

As an analog bitch on a digital planet, I prize what's human-oriented and organic at the core of the Afrofuturism that makes the world go 'round. Since Gnarl's Barkley's second disc, The Odd Couple, appeared on iTunes prior to its official release date, some of my colleagues perpetually infatuated with the new have rushed to slap these digital darlings with a sophomore-slump tag. Yet I appreciate Cee-Lo and Danger Mouse's follow-up to 2006's trailblazer St. Elsewhere (Downtown) precisely for its vinyl anachronisms: it hews even deeper to a pre-urban blues aesthetic. For all the comparisons of The Odd Couple to Tricky's vintage-'90s trip-hop, the disc is more electric mud. Cee-Lo and his Dungeon Fam long ago conceived of their cipher as a postmodern ring shout, making this disc accompaniment to an illusory barn dance.

Danger Mouse synthesizes '60s garage and psych, spaghetti western and biker-flick soundtracks, raga drone and Edwin Hawkins' modifications of gospel for hippies via soul-searching technosynthesis, while he and his podnub never eschew the values of the red clay underpinning their Georgia berth. And this soil nourishes these vanguard polymaths' simultaneous reconstruction of grown-ass R&B and tribal music. The fathomless murk of songs like the soul-folk beauty "She Knows" and "Open Book" — with its grunting, didgeridoo-cloning harmonies — forgives the stray pop toss-off ("Whatever") and provides rich context for the swirling hymn "A Little Better" and the unchained lightning genius of Katrina boogie "Run (I'm a Natural Disaster)." Riding on Cee-Lo's dark lyricism, The Odd Couple proves that the viral triumph of "Crazy" was no fluke, but a masterpiece with a vast, occult network of sonic atlases hidden within.

LIONEL LOUEKE
Karibu
(Blue Note)

Benin-born guitarist-vocalist Lionel Loueke has become the poster child of jazz's current multicultural fascination. That's not such a bad thing, even though the genre has always been international and of younger players are in as much of a postmodern bag as anyone else. But Loueke has wrapped his West African roots around jazz in a subtle, distinctive ways, and Karibu, his major label debut, has a confident personality propelled by his years as a top sideman.

Loueke taught himself to play by listening to George Benson, and like Benson, he often vocally follows his guitar lines. But Loueke has a less conventional approach and a broader compositional range, writing seven of the record's nine songs. The title tune, meaning "welcome" in Swahili, showcases Loueke's light, lilting samba-like touch on the guitar as he's backed by his longtime international bandmates, Swiss bassist Massimo Biolcati and Hungarian drummer Ferenc Nemeth. The trio's delicate percussive sound relies on their cohesive interactions. Biolcati often nimbly picks along with Loueke, while Nemeth uses brushes as much as he does sticks. Pianist Herbie Hancock sits in on two tunes, contributing a typically angular brooding solo to Loueke's original "Seven Teens." On "Light Dark," Hancock and the trio are joined by Wayne Shorter's darting soprano saxophone, giving the tune an elongated, freer feel, and Shorter also guests on an inventive, up-tempo recasting of John Coltrane's "Naima." THEE SILVER MOUNT ZION MEMORIAL ORCHESTRA & TRA-LA-LA BAND
13 Blues for Thirteen Moons
(Constellation)

Over five great albums, Silver Mount Zion, heir to the Godspeed You! Black Empire, has proven to be at the top of a genre they basically invented: that of epic, multivocal Canadian collectives. A singularity of vision is just one differentiation between this group and apolitical peers, and the Constellation stable has been adamant about not only documenting life during wartime, but pointing fingers at the culprits, which puts them philosophically closer to Grass than the Polyphonic Spree.

"The hangman's got a hard on ... the pundit reeks of coffin ... we will not sing in your damn parade," slays the title track. The underscored and contradictory "we will not sing" points to the entire project as the creation of an alternate reality more than an escapist antiparade. Leader Efrim Menuck pointedly jabs at would-be followers with lines like "Your band is bland ambition" and "Silk-screen that, ye twits across thy Internet" on "1,000,000 Died to Make This Sound." Although he targets "four corners resplendent with indie rock creeps" on the title track, Menuck has masterminded a sonic set piece designed to appeal to those creeps as much as a Wes Anderson flick. Huge-sounding strings, seven-part vocals, and the famous Constellation production quality are either enhanced or negated by an opening salvo of what sounds like feedback over glass harmonicas. It's gorgeous to the point of excess. "Blindblindblind" has Menuck bellowing, "We want punks in the palace / 'cause punks got the loveliest dreams." These protagonists are offset against "policemen in parallel lines" and ends with a rousing "some hearts are true." As imagined national anthems of antinationalism go, one could not hope for better. DJ QUEST
Questolous
(ZQ)

Beginning with the double assault of the killer opening two tracks of Questolous, you sense what's in store: DJ Quest's new solo full-length will live up to its title's promise of being all that — and more. Much more, in fact, as the longtime San Francisco turntablist of Bullet Proof Scratch Hamsters, Space Travelers, and Live Human fame serves up one of those perfectly balanced, satisfying albums that makes you fall in love with hip-hop all over again.

Guest vocalists such as Luke Sick, Bas-One, Eddie K, and many of the full-length's other contributors have been down with Quest for a long time, and know exactly how to complement his style. Longtime DJ collaborator 2 Fresh produced "Quite Simple," while fellow former Bullet Proof Space Traveler DJ Marz lets loose on "High Valium" alongside Quest — who produces the dope track — and Holland's DJ Vandal (S.W.O.T. Team), who kills it on the turntables. Along with beatmakers like Oaty Love, DJ T-Rock, and Dawgish, Vandal is also one of the numerous producers responsible for much of the recording's impressive range, which roves from abstract, electro, and spacey grooves to infectious hip-hop beats and breaks. Quest himself produced the distinctly Yay Area-sounding, slowed-down-to-65-bpm, minimal track "Who What!," on which Bas-One rhymes almost in slo-mo. But at the core of Questolous's appeal is the turntable as instrument — and DJ Quest is its master, effortlessly massaging and manipulating it to make new, beautiful sounds. (Billy Jam)

RICK ROSS Trilla (Def Jam)

Some rappers like to use outlandish statements to describe their very human traits. So when Rick Ross says midway through Trilla that he's "the poor people's president," I'm not surprised. Unfortunately, I'm also not convinced. Tracks like "Money Make Me Come" won't exactly move the electorate. Set atop lackluster beats and clichéd refrains, his latest work is a 15-track ode to hustling, the streets, and why he's rich and you're not. There's also the obligatory introspective ending, "I'm Only Human," which seems as out of place as Ross standing in line at his local K-Mart. (Jamilah King)

Drop that bleak cocoon, body rockers — it's so last season. Behold clubland's sleek spring changes: Jeffrey Paradise (left) rises from the smoldering ashes of DJ Jefrodesiac, while DJ Tedd Patterson stops in to jump start the new Thread Recordings house label.

SUPER EGO Positivity — can we get some, please? Sure. Zing! Spring's come bounding from its musty, dusty closet like a newly out Floridian, little rainbow fanny pack ablaze, itchy pink nipple rings jingling. Poor green thing! Isn't it up to us to lead her, tripping and grinning, into the limelight fantastica? Aren't we already there? Change, unlike Aqua Net and Paco Rabanne, is in the air. The clubs, they've gone azalea-crazy, bursting with neon irises and tenebrous fuchsia streaks. Cocktails mysteriously grow stronger in our hands. And parties, parties everywhere — there's far too much to do right now. Hell, my nightlife Blackberry just exploded all over my fresh electric Onitsuka Tiger shoes.

Anybody here got a Wet Ones? "We're spinning in the pyramid of life / As day turns to night," goes a latest wriggly dance-floor burner. "I wish the stars could shine now / For they are closer / They are near," goes another. "Let's make out," goes a third. Sex, stars, spinning, and you — sounds like a few times I'd love to have. How 'bout we do the bunny hop and rock our burgundy hair at the following affairs? Oh, and bring that spring girl, too. There's always room for one more in the back.

WELCOME TO PARADISE

What do you do when you get too famous? Besides wipe up dog shit with your borrowed Chanel? How 'bout change your name and make a record? I sincerely hope you've made it at least once to two of the most regularly orgasmic parties in the city: Frisco Disco and Blow Up. If you have, then you're intimately familiar with the semi-nude gymnastics, lubed-up disco-house-electro jams, and jailbait fanbase of one DJ Jefrodesiac, our fair burg's current reigning turntable sex god. I may just win that tiara back, though, because Jefrodesiac is dead. Metaphorically. Witness the birth of Jeffrey Paradise, his latest incarnation, who's about to release a new EP on PrinceHouse Records and make us all update our contacts. He'll be debuting this next evolution at Blow Up on Friday, April 11, which is also, somewhat confusingly, his birthday bash. Because one personality is never enough!

WILL THEY SERVE COSMOS?

I'm not sure how I feel about the space program, but hey, if the nearby NASA Ames Research Center and something rather ominously called the Space Generation Advisory Council want to cohost a big rave at Moffett Field, presenting forward-minded DJs like Amon Tobin, John Tejada, Dr. Toast, and Tycho, well, beam me up (snort). I'm talking about Yuri's Night, an astro-fantastical, techno-futuristic anniversary celebration of Russian cosmonaut Yuri Gagarin's historic first flight into space in 1961. Yuri's Night, Saturday, April 12, is being feted this year with 153 parties in 46 countries on goddess-knows-how-many giant-screen satellite feeds, so make sure your outfit is tight. Also on the blast-off tap: a huge technology fair with zippy visual installations and electronic doodad demonstrations galore. Pack your sonic screwdriver.

BIGGER BOOTY

Srsly, I wept when longtime San Francisco mainstay Fag Fridays ended in February — and not just because my Moisture Wear wasn't quite so hypoallergenic after all. The gay and their ilk really lost something when the party shut down after 12 years, not least of all a soulful house crashpad in the weekend's early afterhours.

No more tears, though. "Girl, we couldn't wait to have a Friday off!" David Peterson, one half of Fag promoters Big Booty, exuberantly told me. Big Booty's certainly taking advantage of its free time. Peterson's

Booty partner, Jose Mineros, just launched a bouncy house Saturday weekly, Collide, at the fab Club 222 (www.myspace.com/222hyde). Fag Fridays will make a special return at Mighty for Pride. And biggest of all, Big Booty just launched a new dance-music label, Thread Recordings. They'll be toasting Thread's first release, "The Rhythm" by DJ David Harness, with a deep and thrilling party at luminous megacub Temple, featuring Harness and legendary NYC DJ Tedd Patterson. Boys keep swinging. SFBG

Club Gossip

» REVIEW Wanna gossip? Of course you do. Can you believe that Justin Timberlake is inducting Madonna into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame? Wasn't he, like, one when her first single dropped? I know.

OK, so I was four years old, but at least I remember watching the "Lucky Star" video premiere on MTV, in which Madonna exposed the navel that would launch a now-25-year career.

But it wasn't fuzzy navels I was hung up on at video dance night Club Gossip's Madonna tribute Feb. 29. It was the Material Girl: a vodka, peach schnapps, and cranberry juice concoction. Two sticky-sweet cocktails later, it was time to dance to DJed songs and VJed videos that documented Madonna's many reinventions from her playful early years to her controversial Sex book era to her current kabbalah/yoga-mother period.

If my Madonna moves had been rusty, all those tips on Wikihow.com's entry labeled "How to Dance Like Madonna" — which encouraged me to wear a tight outfit, get edgy, and release my inhibitions — really helped me get into the groove. Before I knew it, I was bopping, vogue-ing, and disco dancing along with a new crop of twentysomething Madonna wannabes in headbands and bangles.

While Madonna may have been an odd artist to honor at a night that generally concentrates on darker bands such as the Smiths, Siouxsie and the Banshees, and Depeche Mode, there is no disputing her brief goth flirtation via her "Frozen" video. I may have heard a rumor that that wasn't her song, but no, that kinda gossip isn't welcome on this night. The girls would've taken my eyes out with their crucifixes. (Joshua Rotter)

PETER MORÉN
The Last Tycoon 12⁹⁸ CD

The highly anticipated debut solo album from Peter Morén, the lead singer of Swedish indie megastars Peter Dinklage and John.

LIVE AT AMOeba SF
THURSDAY, MAY 1ST AT 8PM!

THE BREEDERS
Mountain Battles 11⁹⁸ CD

Mountain Battles captures all the bittersweet electricity of classic Breeders records like Pod and Last Splash, and still manages to break new ground. Also playing live April 30th at Slim's!

TAPES 'N' TAPES
Walk It Off 11⁹⁸ CD

"Unique in an era of slick '80s chic, mixing the opaque jams of Pavement with the bruised-teen freakiness of The Pixies, while adding cocktail jazz and Tex-Mex folk music like thrift store finds." — Spin

COLIN MELOY
Colin Meloy Sings Live! 12⁹⁸ CD

The Decemberists' lead singer/songwriter takes his audience on a spellbinding walk through his oeuvre on this stripped-down, acoustic album and provides a glimpse of some new material.

LIVE AT AMOeba SF
THURSDAY, MAY 2ND AT 8PM!

THE PHENOMENAUTS
For All Man Kind 13⁹⁸ CD

Inspired by new wave and '70s punk, this is the third full-length from the world's bravest space band. Each CD comes packaged with an exclusive custom-shaped enamel Phenomenauts pin!

FOALS
Antidotes 11⁹⁸ CD

Foals are a five-piece dance-rock band from Oxford, England. Completing the circuit through the minimalism of Steve Reich, guitars that sound like insects and tennis player Andy Roddick, theirs is a uniquely winning formula.

CLINIC
Do It! 12⁹⁸ CD

Clinic's fifth studio album is a Summer album, a warped Technicolor celebration — pop music and severe cut-ups going from melody to acid psychosis to acoustic.

Hottest Advancement in Sexual Performance!

Discover new sizzling sensations together!

Paravol's fast acting sexual fuel puts the control back in your hands. With its new high potency formula, Paravol intensifies the experience, resulting in uninhibited satisfaction (for both of you).

Maximum Strength Sexual Satisfaction - Not everyone knows that there are multiple phases of the sexual response cycle, starting with desire then arousal. Most sexual enhancement products focus solely on the arousal phase, skipping over desire, which is like skipping breakfast, the most important meal of the day. Packed with only the best quality natural ingredients, Paravol sees to it you reach the mind blowing phase.

Double Action Formula - Also unlike other sexual enhancement products, Paravol improves both your short term libido as well as your long term. So even though you are receiving benefits instantly, the natural ingredients enhance your desire and arousal for future experiences as well!

visual art

Mind-mending and mind-bending: A playful and alternatively inventive and traditional approach to geometric shape is present in new art by Will Yackulic (such as the gouache, watercolor, and typewriter on paper piece Granted Ground, left). It's also present in work by SF's Todd Bura (the oil paint, paper, and nails work Untitled (NGYO), center) and Ruth Laskey (2007's handwoven Twill Series Cerulean Blue/Marigold, right).

Neo Geo Trio

Fresh patterns emerge from SF's post-Mission School landscape

By Johnny Ray Huston
 > johnny@sfbg.com

"Bay-Area Now" roundups have come and gone since Glen Helfand coined the term "the Mission School" in an influential 2002 Guardian cover piece (See "The Mission school," 04/07/02). Exactly six years later, the "heartfelt, handmade" traits Helfand described still hang heavy over or range freely through local art aesthetics, even if a few core creative forces from the loose movement — Alicia McCarthy, especially — didn't cash in on the cachet of a higher profile. But April is always a month for growth: this year it brings a trio of shows by San Francisco (or SF-to-NYC) artists who've moved through or around Mission School color and figuration, forging a new direction and forming a new pattern. Call it 21st-century Neo Geo, though the tag might not apply to what these artists will be doing 12 months from today.

A playful approach to geometric shape is at the core of distinct traits shared by Todd Bura, Ruth Laskey, and Will Yackulic's new shows. Dozens of triangles form formidable spheres in "A Prompt and Present Cure," Yackulic's collection of 10 works on paper at Gregory Lind Gallery. These spheres have been likened to geodesic domes, disco globes, and IBM Selectric typewriter balls.

I'd throw in mentions of Asteroids and the orb from Phantasm (1979) for good measure, though such 1980s pop cult references are no longer as near the forefront of Yackulic's visuals as when he offered a twist on the phrase cubist via images that suggested the video game Q-Bert gone existentially lonely. Yackulic's new work is a breakthrough, due to sheer inventiveness: in all the show's pieces, he paints with a typewriter.

Throughout most of "A Prompt and Present Cure," Yackulic uses endlessly repeated asterisk and period symbols to generate waves and horizons of visual energy, and sometimes even employs the typewriter to create the show's signature orbs. Like op art, the resulting pieces lure one to press one's face against the object itself, and they take on three-dimensionality when viewed as group formations from a distance. The potent, disconcerting humor of Yackulic's show stems partly from his laconic use of text, a strategy that — along with his use of pre-electric typewriters — obliquely acknowledges his New York School poetic roots. But it stems primarily from his spheres, a gang of faceless main characters. Some are darker, some lighter, as if the viewer facing them is giving off varying degrees of glare. Yackulic also has a droll flair for timing, saving his bravura gesture for the tenth, last, and largest piece, where one orb joins another — a cause for celebration, or worry?

Some Time to Mend the Mind, the title of that duel-sphere finale, might apply in reverse to Todd Bura's "Misfits" at Triple Base Gallery. Like Yackulic, Bura has an interest in geometrically-based architectural representations of mental states. But his penchant for arranging wooden right angles results in three-dimensional sculptural forms in addition to two-dimensional painterly ones. He also has a poetic sensibility, though his gambit of giving 14 pieces the title Untitled, followed by a small group of capital letters in parentheses, is cumulatively closer to language poetry, albeit language poetry overcome with angst.

"Misfits" has a unique quality, as if Bura found fragments from his inner world, brought them to a room, then mounted or arranged them for people to see. (Its quietude and careful use of placement, akin to that of the Bay Area's Bill Jenkins, also draws attention to the space around Bura's works — even or especially if they are framed or on canvas.) While Bura might be devoted to the idea of an unfinished whole that is nonetheless greater than the sum of its parts, there are a few standout enigmas. Untitled (NIT) builds from his past exploration of — and emphasis on — paper's materiality, while remaining a riddle: does it utilize the inset of a book's cover, or is it a collage in which comics peak from the very edges of aging blank pages? (A small formation of pinpricks on the surface characterizes Bura's varied minimalism.) Perhaps indebted to Richard Tuttle, the much larger oil painting Untitled (ETRI) layers light over darkness. (Or does it cover darkness with light? Regardless, Bura plays the recurrent binary both ways.) The latter suggests a buried cross or intersection.

Ruth Laskey's approach to geometric form is based upon intersections, though her presentation, at least at first glance, trades Bura's evocative, open-ended symbolism for a plain approach that recognizes that literal meaning is many-faceted. As the saying goes, Laskey's "7 Weavings," at Ratio 3, is what it is: seven tapestries from her ongoing "Twill" series, where the structures or perhaps strictures of the loom and the diagonals of twill shape help form diamonds, triangles, pyramids, and crosses of color. Like Yackulic, Laskey's process involves extreme repetition that yields varying waves of visual energy —, albeit megaminimal, muted waves that might require squinting. As Rachel Churner notes in a recent Artforum essay, Laskey's tapestries "are not fields for projection, but rather instances of the figure being imbedded in the ground itself."

One of the rich literal pleasures of Laskey's tapestries is their deployment of specific reds, blues, yellows, and greens, which is less antic but just as imaginative as the peak Mission School-era in terms of drawing from Josef Albers's color theories. At times, new hues emerge from the intersection of two individual colors that Laskey has first created by blending dyes and then painting the thread that she weaves through cloth. There's an inscrutable quality to "7 Weavings" that echoes that of Bura's and Yackulic's shows: the colorful cloth shapes Laskey forms might as well be flags for countries in a world a bit more observant, and less brutish, than our own. sfbc

"Form +"

REVIEW With the evolution of the gallery into a white, blank space, the artwork displayed within its walls has metamorphosed as well. The first-floor exhibit at the Meridian Gallery, "Form +," — curated along with two adjacent shows, "Frank André Jamme: New Exercises" and "Dhyana" by California College of the Arts dean Larry Rinder — call into play both of these factors.

In its very nature, the three-story Victorian that houses Meridian already opposes the clean lines most contemporary art galleries aspire to. Instead, one enters to a bare first floor, ripe with references to its early 20th-century past. A fireplace nook, a step down from the level of the rest of the floor, houses an installation — penned directly on the walls — of tiny paintings in graphite and gouache by Léonie Guyer. Her clean forms are abstract — as are all of the works included in the three shows — and filled with solid colors. Within this busy context, Guyer's pieces help to establish the crux of "Form +." Guyer's clean forms are abstract, as is all the work included in these shows; filled with solid colors, and within this rather busy context, help to establish the crux of "Form +." Aiming to address the meditative qualities of form, this exhibition posits formalism as not merely about the materials but a very specific cerebral process. Guyer rejects the necessity for a space devoid of context in favor of a site-specificity that almost obliterates her pieces yet maintains the viewer's consideration.

"Form +"s remaining works, exhibited in less quirky settings, are slightly more insular. In spite of the self-referential qualities of the pieces on paper by Todd Bura or Prajakti Jayavant, who both account for every line or crease in their compositions, there is an overarching sense of history: the immediate history of the artist's hand and that of the artists' awareness of their place within the broader timeline of art history. As a result, the throwback atmosphere of Meridian's space both complements and highlights the beautiful subtleties of these works by a somewhat underrepresented segment of contemporary Bay Area artists. (Ava Jancar)

Jant-Bi and Urban Bush Women threaten to melt the roof of Yerba Buena Center for the Arts Theater with their incendiary collaboration.

Super Scales

African-grounded dance dazzles

By Rita Felciano
> a&eletters@sfbg.com

The words were sometimes garbled, but the body's language was not. Les Écailles de la Mémoire (The Scales of Memory), a fiery collaboration between Senegal's all-male Jant-Bi and Brooklyn's Urban Bush Women, shouted, chanted, and danced about anger, pain, and love, always with an Africa-grounded sensibility.

It's more than slightly ironic that the men of Jant-Bi are more familiar to Bay Area audiences than the all-female Urban Bush Women, who have uncovered African American cultural traditions for more than 20 years. Jant-Bi last appeared in San Francisco in 2005 with Fagala, a response to genocide. The Bush Women have not been seen here since 1990, when their Praise House illuminated a failed festival event.

The English title of Jant-Bi's and Urban Bush Women's gorgeously complex investigation of what people carry in their DNA is apt. Scales of Memory strips away the layers of hardness that have grown around racial pain. But it also measures, evaluates, and ultimately honors that reality.

"I accept," the piece's 14 dancers announce at the end.

The colonizing of Africa and the history of Africans in this country provide the base for Scales of Memory's complex exploration of subjugation and survival. The piece is brilliantly supported by Fabrice Bouillon-Laforet's mixed score, which draws upon urban, natural, and musical compositions from various sources. The sounds enhanced Germaine Acogny and Jawole Willa Jo Zollar's choreography, which is rooted in specifics but open to the world.

Scales of Memory began with the ensemble divided into small groups, each staring silently at the audience. One by one, the dancers stepped forward to shout out generations of ancestry. Though there was no overt textual narrative, the images evoked stories of communities destroyed and resurrected. The solos and ensemble dances hammered their way into our consciousness; they also drew us in with the strength — and humor — of their realization.

Both groups feature extraordinary performers who speak with an African-based dance language but use it in contemporary, individualistic ways. When the men strolled across the stage in unison, they could have stepped out of a Gene Kelly movie. But when they threw themselves into knees-to-the-sky leaps, it became clear that the ancestral ground beneath their feet was composed of clay, not concrete. The women's big-hipped acknowledgment that they've got back — a Bush Women trademark — had a jazzy urban sass to it. Throughout, the dancers exuded power and self-confidence.

Nora Chipaumire, now Urban's primary dancer, served as a bridge-building priestess figure. When she stepped forth, at first in a white ceremonial gown, she seemed to contain the levels of history and experience within Scales. But all the dancers embodied the pain of enslavement in a way that made it raw, visceral, and present. They put it on stage without any comment.

The men's red T-shirts became gags and face-covering hoods. Seemingly exuberant male dancers became unbearable to watch once it became clear that their hands were tied behind their backs and an invisible force was beating them into dancing. The performers spread individual expressions of rage and anguish across the stage. They called up the suffering of Africa's diaspora, then dragged themselves back into a life-giving, body-to-body circle dance similar to the one at Scales' beginning.

A mourner's bench in a slave-auction scene — a seat reserved for sinners in African American church tradition — became an auction block that stirred up old shame. Chipaumire and her male partner sat on the bench and stroked their own heads. They called up body memories of the degrading examinations of physical fitness that determined a slave's price. But the prop then transformed into one element of a gathering place. Men and women on facing benches jabbered at each other in a scene of pure comedy, one that recalls the memorable finale of Alvin Ailey's Revelations (1960).

Strong solos balanced group sequences. Catherine Dénécy's "I Am Who I Am" was simultaneously an attack and a celebration. The modern "Dance Hall" segment offered another form of communal celebration: women preened to comments by an off-stage male voice during its delightful opening moments. Later, a voice-over presentation of a Rumi poem was too sappy. But the ensuing dances between couples were alternately hot and heavy or tender and shy, with a feisty Chipaumire letting her partner know exactly how far he was allowed to go. Restrained or not, Scales of Memory's visceral heat just about melted the roof off the theater at Yerba Buena Center for the Arts. SFBG

Company C

PREVIEW Good things are happening in the East Bay. One is the Walnut Creek-based Company C, Charles Anderson's 14-member chamber ballet company. In the six short years of its existence, these dancers have created a respectable following. Anderson is a former New York City Ballet dancer whose family runs the well-established Contra Costa Ballet Centre. No doubt this helped the company initially, but today Company C draws good crowds — and not just of the family and friends variety. They take their programs all over the Bay Area and as far north as Santa Rosa and Mendocino. This weekend they take over Yerba Buena Center for the Arts with an ambitious quintet of works, including the world premiere of Twyla Tharp's duet Armenia, set to 10 folksongs from that region. Michael Smuin's 1997 darkly lush Starshadow, created for three couples and set to music by Maurice Ravel, pays tribute to the late choreographer. Former Paul Taylor dancer and now-choreographer David Grenke went to Tom Waits for inspiration for his duet, Vespers (1997). Artistic director Anderson's two works from 2007, Boleto and Echoes of Innocence, close the show. (Rita Felciano)

COMPANY C Sat/12, 8 p.m. and Sun/13, 2 p.m. Yerba Buena Center for the Arts, 701 Mission, SF. $20-$35. (415)978-2787, www.ybca.org

The current production brings to life an early work of Noel Coward's, The Better Half, written for the Grand Guignol of London in 1921, and then swiftly buried by Lord Chamberlain, who did not approve of the "loose" morals depicted in this short, sexy one-act. After that little joy ride, André de Lorde and Alfred Binet's thoroughly eerie Old Women traps you in a deep freeze. The post-show skits and film clips range from the kinky to creepy — especially when the lights go all the way out. (Giattina) Read full review at www.sfbg.com.

The Government Inspector American Conservatory Theater, 415 Geary; 749-

2228, www.act-sf.org. $14-82. Tues-Sat, 8pm (also Wed and Sat, 2pm); Sun, 2pm. No matinee April 9. Through April 20. American Conservatory Theater's opening to The Government Inspector — a mute flurry of activity to the strains of a boisterous concerto — briefly recalls the balletic presentation of The Overcoat, the last work by Nikolai Gogol to grace the Geary's stage. But what strength there is in this piece (which, unlike The Overcoat, Gogol actually wrote for the stage) comes from the expert delivery of pungent comic dialogue, vividly updated in Alistair Beaton's 2005 translation-adaptation. To this end, artistic director Carey Perloff has assembled a dream cast of local comedic acting talent, headed up by Broadway vet Graham Beckel as the mayor of a small town of petty officials whose fear of an impending visit by a government poobah has them mistakenly wining, dining, and shamelessly bribing a penniless sybarite (Gregory Wallace) just passing through. Costumes, makeup, and scenic design, meanwhile, do equal justice to the broad humor. But beyond adorning the deft performances and savoring the juicy turns of phrase and ripe insults bandied about, the play's lack of suspense or intrigue (its send-up of official corruption is "topical" only in the most general, benign, and banal degree) means that attention begins to flag early. Working with director and veteran solo performer Charlie Varon, Dan Hoyle recounts his powerfully etched human-scale impression of the scope of oil politics in Nigeria as he discovered it during a 10-month trip in 2005 as a Fulbright scholar. Without benefit of costume or scenery and with merely an atmospheric sound design (courtesy of David Hines) and some key lighting shifts (done by Patti Meyer), Hoyle plays more than 20 characters based on people he met and interviewed. Affecting the pidgin English that is the lingua franca of Nigeria and smoothly transitioning through various postures and demeanors, Hoyle recreates his reception as a white American from sore thumb. We travel with him widely, from stops at the United States embassy and local bars frequented by expat oil workers to the territory of dozens of militia groups at war with the state and one another for the liberation of the delta and a share of the oil money. There's a certain admirable, audacity in Hoyle's Nigeria project, not just in his fearless reconnaissance of deeply troubled waters but in his willingness to boldly assume the voices and personae of ordinary Nigerians, to step inside their perspectives and encourage his American audiences to follow. The play's two hours could stand trimming and focusing. Nevertheless, Hoyle's work brings a burgeoning talent to a still woefully neglected subject that is both absorbing in its dramatic complexity and urgent in its politics. What is a human being worth, and who is best qualified to determine the currency? In Shotgun Theatre's production of Mrs. Warren's Profession, the question of worth hovers on the fringe of each polite (and not-so-polite) conversation between mother and daughter, businessman and businesswoman, worldly madame and feckless youth. Of course it is a matter upon which none of the characters can agree. Is it the physical manifestations of hard, cold cash, the merit imbued by a good name and the accompanying social position, or accrue merit of self-worth through integrity and hard work? Brusquely awkward Fivie (Emily Jordan) isolates herself from friends, fiancé, and family for reasons of moral certitude, while her "born vulgarian" mother (a pitch-perfect Trish Mullholland) reminds her that everything and everyone she is turning away from have afforded her precisely the independence to do so. Though several of the actors deliver strong performances, overall the production focuses so much attention on fussy details (an overlong musical prelude, a projection screen of shifting skyline, a revolving set) and on each character's bombastically delivered convictions that much of the original script's playfulness has been lost, and the audience is left only with a lingering sense of unease, whatever that's worth. Tragedy: A tragedy Berkeley Repertory Theatre's Thrust Stage, 2025 Addison, Berk; (510) 647-2949, www.berkeleyrep.org, $13.50-69, Wed-Fri, 7pm; Thurs-10/Sat-12, 8pm (also Sat, 2pm); Sun/13-2 and 7pm. Les Waters directs an American premiere of Will Eno's tragicomedy about your average, run-of-the-mill apocalypse. A title like Tragedy: A tragedy has, you might think, promises to keep. According to New York playwright Will Eno, whose previous works include 2004's Thom Pain (based on nothing), tragedy will out, even in the tragedy business. Scattered over the Thrust Stage at the Berkeley Rep, where the play enjoys its sharp American premiere, stand three garrulous TV reporters. As the scene unfolds, it's clear this is a special news day, in fact one long day's journey into perpetual night. The sun is missing — overdue or something — and apparently not coming back. It's the kind of catastrophic event unfolding in real-time that musters all the energies, ego, and élan of the news professionals. It's what they train for: the unending crisis that calls for unending comment, a filibustering of fate. But Eno's very funny play — featuring an enjoyable, expert ensemble and deftly directed by Les Waters — is no political tract. It instead remains, like his babbling newscasters, precisely vague about everything — all the better in the play's case to sneak up on the sensation and insight hiding behind the minutely, fleetingly particular. Maybe tragedy, it suggests, is already tautology, since we're born into it, and every peaceful little moment that brushes us so lovingly also whispers demise. (A) The Trojan Women Aurora Theatre, 2081 Addison, Berk; (510) 843-4822, www.auroratheatre.org, $40-50 ($28 for previews). Previews Wed/9, 8pm. Opens Thurs/10, 8pm. Wishful Drinking Berkeley Repertory Theatre, Roda Stage, 2015 Addison, Berk; (510) 647-2949, www.berkeleyrep.org, $27-69. Call for schedule. Extended run: Through Sat/12. Shortly after taking the stage, Carrie Fisher gets the ugly business about the gay Republican party operative who died in her bed of an overdose out of the way: "He didn't die in the saddle." Phee! But that is one of only a few indiscretions not attributed to the 51-year-old actress and author. Her tabloid life — from the exploits of her famous parents (Eddie Fisher and Debbie Reynolds), to her failed marriage with folk singer Paul Simon, to her well-documented stints in rehab and the loony bin — has left little to public imagination. Rest assured, Fisher reveals much that managed to elude the press — like what George Lucas had her wear under her Princess Leia gown — in a gossipy string of tales that begins with her birth and works in everything from Samuel Johnson references to pot jokes. Frequently, under Tony Taccone's direction, she pulls out audience members to help her demonstrate important matters, such as how the Leia buns don't flatter anyone. Quite orally fixated, she rarely speaks without simultaneously smoking, sipping on Diet Cokes, or snacking. All the while, she paces the living room set with a backdrop of a huge crooked window that doubles as a video screen into Fisher's past. It's hard to spot the point in this refreshingly unpreachy tell-all. What I learned is that Fisher is wickedly funny and undaunted to stand before all of us simply as herself. (Giattina)

San Francisco International Chocolate Salon

PREVIEW I grew up in an area with annual artichoke and garlic festivals, which were fun, but I could only eat one or two artichoke pies before I was a bored-as-hell 12-year-old with a full stomach. The San Francisco International Chocolate Salon, however, is something I can get behind. For $20 — about the cost of a decent small box of chocolates — attendees will be treated to an array of samples from dozens of the world's leading chocolatiers including Marti Chocolatt and Christopher Elbow, as well as tastes from classic chocolate makers like Scharffen Berger and Guittard.

The scheduled back-to-back presentations and demonstrations from chocolate connoisseurs will give plenty of time to rest the taste buds. The first event of the day is perhaps the oddest: local hair designer Fritz Clay of HairPlay apparently interpreted the meaning of a chocolate salon more literally than others — he'll be giving a 30-minute demonstration of chocolate-inspired hairstyles.

Later, Chocoholics will demonstrate full-body chocolate frosting, which would probably be a better fit within Good Vibrations's event calendar than this event. The company produces a wide variety of skin-applicable chocolate, including single-serving "Quickies" packages and edible tattoo kits. But this is an all ages event, so don't expect any bellow-the-belt chocolate frosting fun. For that, you'll want to pocket some samples for later.

The event continues until 6 p.m. with chocolate-inspired artwork, films, and cooking demos. Luckily, that leaves time for dinner — perhaps some mole negro? (Alex Felsing)

WEDNESDAY 9

"American Keywords: Marriage, Success, and Democracy" UC Berkeley, Toll Room, Alumni House, Bancroft at Telegraph, Berk; (510) 643-7413. Part of the Tanner Lecture series, this event teams up a UC Berkeley professor with a professor from the University of St. Andrews, to, presume, deconstruct the hallowed — and hollowed — concepts of American culture. I am reminded of Animal Mother in Kubrick's Full Metal Jacket (1987): "Freedom? You'd better flush out your head, new guy. This isn't about freedom — this is a slaughter. If I'm gonna get my balls blown off for a word, my word is poontang."

THURSDAY 10

"The American Presidency in the Year 2008: Looking Back at the Bush Presidency" UC Berkeley, 355 Dwinelle Hall, Bancroft at Telegraph, Berk; (510) 642-4111. 7:30pm, free. This one may end up being a knock-down, drag-out fight: the chief strategist for the 2004 Bush campaign and a National Review writer are on the panel (representing the Dark Side of the Force), along with a Stanford professor and the bureau chief for the Chicago Sun-Times (perhaps, like Luke Skywalker, representing "our only hope"). Either that, or you'll see a bunch of people blowing smoke up the ass of an American dictator. Personally, the whole thing seems premature: we don't know if George W. will declare martial law in November and extend his rule indefinitely.

Not only does it have Old Krakow, perhaps the only Polish restaurant in the city — and a damned good one at that, but this year marks the 20th anniversary

SUNDAY 13

Show and Tell: Your Monthly Art Fix Climate Theater, 285 Ninth St., SF; (415) 285-0830. 2-4pm, $3-5. This ongoing monthly event gives artists an opportunity to share their artwork — whether in-progress or completed — via slides or digital projection, while getting their fingers greasy with potluck delights. Not sure if it'll involve critiquing one another's work or just become a "your picture is so pretty" backslap fest.

TUESDAY 15

"Understanding the Bin Ladens" Commonwealth Club, 595 Market, second floor, SF; (415) 597-6705. 6pm, $18. Pulitzer Prize-winning New Yorker writer Steve Coll, author of Ghost Wars: The Secret History of the CIA, Afghanistan and Bin Laden, from the Soviet Invasion to September 10, 2001 (Penguin, 2004), gives you the down-low intel on the first family Saudi wealth, privilege, and, oh yeah — that one kid. Every family has its black sheep, huh? I'm kidding on the TV series: "One day this jihadi met this fellow, and they knew it was much more than a hunch... that's the day we all became The Bin Laden Bunch." SF80

ESSAY In a journal entry dated Dec. 27, 1835, from his 1840 book Two Years before the Mast, student-turned-seafarer Richard Henry Dana recorded his first impressions of the area we know as the City, while his ship, The Alert, traveled through the Golden Gate:

We passed directly under the high cliff on which the presidio is built ... from whence we could see large and beautifully wooded islands and the mouths of several small rivers ... hundreds of red deer, and [a] stag, with his high branching antlers, were bounding about, looking at us for a moment and then starting off ...

Dana arrived in the Bay Area after one era had ended and before another began. Until the coming of the Spaniards a generation earlier, some 10,000 people, members of around 40 separate tribes, lived between Big Sur and San Francisco, in the densest Native American population north of Mexico. Despite the existence among them of as many as 12 different languages, the people collectively referred to now as the Ohlone lived in relative peace for some 4,500 years.

On his first visit, Dana predicted that the Bay Area would be at the center of California's prosperity. When he returned more than 30 years later in 1868, he discovered that his hotel was built on landfill that had been dumped where The Alert first landed.

Then in middle age, Dana wrote, "The past was real. The present all about me was unreal." Making his way through the crowded streets where the new city he'd predicted was being built, he remarked, "[I] seemed to myself like one who moved in 'worlds not realized.'" Thus Dana became one of the first to articulate the peculiar San Franciscan combination of nostalgia for a lost past and despair over an unrealized future.

The past and future are always alive here. On his first visit, Dana wrote in his notebook about the great city to come. But like many residents of SF today, he slept on the cold, hard ground.

In George Stewart's 1949 science fiction classic Earth Abides, a mysterious disease has killed 99 percent of the Earth's population; the main character, Ish, roams the City and East Bay until he finds a wife. Stewart's book ends in a Twilight Zone scenario, as an old, feeble Ish — now the last living pre-plague American — watches in dismay while his illiterate offspring hunt and frolic like the Ohlone, wearing animal skins and fashioning arrowheads from bottle caps.

After a wildfire, Ish notices that a library has been spared. All the information is still in there, he thinks. "But available to whom?"

Perhaps the knowledge Ish once begged his children to learn can be found in 1970's The Last Whole Earth Catalog. Its 450-plus yellowing Road Atlas-size pages contain terse recommendations of publications about plant identification, organic gardens, windmills, vegetable dyes, edible mushrooms, goat husbandry, and childbirth, while also sharing the fundamentals of yoga, rock climbing, making music with computers, space colonization, and — of course! — the teachings of Buckminster Fuller.

The initial Whole Earth Catalog sought to reconcile Americans' love of nature and technology. In Counterculture Green: The Whole Earth Catalog and American Environmentalism (University Press of Kansas, 303 pages, $34.95), author Andrew Kirk credits its creator, Stewart Brand, with bringing a sense of optimism to environmentalism. A character in Tom Wolfe's 1968 Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test, Brand embodied the cultural intersection of acid and Apple at mid-1960s Stanford University. Kirk examines Brand's 1965 "America Needs Indians" festival, his three-day Trips Festival in 1966, and his time riding the bus as one of Ken Kesey's Merry Pranksters.

Counterculture Green correctly suggests that Brand's utopian lifestyle has a hold on our imagination. But Brand was a leader of the counterculture, not a revolutionary. He believed that the market economy, not political change, would usher in a better world. While today's market — at the behest of individuals — has started to demand renewable energy or sustainable growth, it also has brought us the SUV, suburban sprawl, and the highest fuel prices in history. Apple may empower the individual — or want consumers to believe it does — but at 29, Silicon Valley has the highest concentration of Superfund sites in the country.

Brand deserves credit for intuiting the peculiar "machine in the garden" Bay Area we live in today, a place perhaps more "California Über Alles" than utopian. It's far from the postmarket SF envisioned in Ernest Callenbach's 1975 novel Ecotopia, which is set in 1999, nearly 20 years after Northern California, Oregon, and Washington have seceded from the United States to form the titular nation. A colleague of Brand's, Callenbach bases his society on ideas from the Whole Earth Catalog, but for one major difference — Ecotopia comes into being not through the free market but through an environmental revolution. (I won't spoil it, but here's a hint: it starts in Bolinas!)

While Callenbach's future sometimes resembles a mixture of the Haight Street Fair and Critical Mass, there are twists. Ancient creeks have been unearthed, and on Market Street there is a "charming series of little falls, with water gurgling and splashing, and channels lined with rocks, trees, bamboos and ferns." Ecotopians have instituted a 20-hour work week that involves dismantling dystopian relics such as gas stations. There is a surplus of food produced close to home. Materials that do not decompose are no longer used. This new world is no wilderness — it reconciles civilization and nature. Yet perhaps its most radical idea is that humans can create a utopia without help from a plague, apocalyptic war, or earthquake.

The 1906 San Francisco earthquake leveled 4.7 square miles — or 508 city blocks. It destroyed 28,188 structures, including City Hall, the Hall of Justice, the Hall of Records, the County Jail, the Main Library, five police stations, and more than 40 schools. Yet strangely, many apocalyptic tomes — including recent ones such as the speculative nonfiction best-seller The World Without Us and the born-again Christian Left Behind series — are reluctant to imagine a totally destroyed San Francisco.

In contrast, Chris Carlsson's 2004 utopian novel, After the Deluge (Full Enjoyment Books, 288 page, $13.95), suggests the City is at its most charming when at least partially in ruins, like the old cities of Europe. In Carlsson's post-economic SF of 2157, rising sea levels from global warming submerge much of the Financial District, yet the City adapts by serving old skyscrapers — now converted into housing — with a network of canals.

After the Deluge's vision of reduced work, free bikes, and creeks unearthed from beneath streets borrows from Callenbach's Ecotopia. Yet Carlsson seems to have his most fun imagining a city transformed by ruins: take a subtle comment on the Federal Building at Seventh and Market streets. In Carlsson's map of SF circa 2157, the monstrosity that some call the Death Star is simply labeled "The Ruins."

Similarly, the photographs in After the Ruins 1906 and 2006: Rephotographing the San Francisco Earthquake and Fire (University of California Press, 134 pages, $24.95) appear to delight in the City's impermanence. Mark Klett presents famous images of the smoldering city in 1906 alongside carefully shot contemporary photographs from the same vantage points. Cleverly, these images are arranged in a manner that suggests the ruins aren't just the past but also an inevitable future.

The aftermaths of SF's earthquakes are often described in utopian terms, as if cracks in the landscape revealed the possibility of a better world. In After the Ruins, a 1906 quake survivor remembers cooperation not seen since the days of the Ohlone:

A spirit of good nature and helpfulness prevailed and cheerfulness was common. The old and feeble were tenderly aided. Food was voluntarily divided. No one richer, none poorer than his fellow man.

In an essay accompanying After the Ruins, Rebecca Solnit recollects the 1989 earthquake similarly:

The night of the quake, the liquor store across the street held a small barbecue ... I talked to the neighbors. I walked around and visited people. That night the powerless city lay for the first time in many years under a sky whose stars weren't drowned out by electric lights.

Greta Snider's classic early-'90s punk and bike zine Mudflap tells of a utopia for bicyclists created by the 1989 Loma Prieta quake. Until torn down, a closed-off section of damaged Interstate 280 became a bike superhighway where one could ride above the City without fear of cars. Earthquakes are seen to have utopian potential in SF, because, like protests or Critical Mass, they stop traffic. In 1991, Gulf War protestors stormed the Bay Bridge, shutting down traffic on the span for the first time since the 1989 quake. Perhaps in tribute to the utopian possibilities of both events, William Gibson's 1993 book Virtual Light imagines a postquake-damaged Bay Bridge as a home for squatter shanties and black market stalls.

Carlsson's new nonfiction book, Nowtopia (AK Press, 288 pages, $18.95), explores new communities springing up in the margins of capitalist society. Subtitled How Pirate Programmers, Outlaw Bicyclists, and Vacant-Lot Gardeners Are Inventing the Future Today, it looks for seeds of post-economic utopia in places such as the SF Bike Kitchen and the Open Source software movement. According to Carlsson, these communities "manifest the efforts of humans to transcend their lives as wage-slaves. They embrace a culture that rejects the market, money, and business. Engaging in technology in creative and experimental ways, the Nowtopians are involved in a guerilla war over the direction of society."

A founder of Critical Mass, Carlsson praises the biofuels movement and bicycle culture for promoting self-sufficiency through tools. With its optimism and endorsement of technology, Nowtopia occasionally evokes the Whole Earth Catalog. Yet unlike Brand's tome, it focuses on class and how people perform work in today's society. Carlsson finds that in their yearning for community, people will gladly perform hours of unpaid labor on behalf of something they love that they believe betters the world.

Within today's SF, Carlsson cites Alemany Farm as an example of nowtopia. Volunteers took over an abandoned SF League of Urban Gardeners (SLUG) farm next to the Alemany Projects, farming it for several years before the City gave them official permission. "Instead of traditional political forms like unions or parties, people are coming together in practical projects," Carlsson writes. "They aren't waiting for an institutional change from on-high, but are getting on with building the new world in the shell of the old."

Ironically, the only literature that truly envisions the complete destruction of large areas of the City are the postwar plans of the San Francisco Redevelopment Agency. In 1956, it began the first of two projects in the Fillmore, slashing the neighborhood in two with a widened Geary Boulevard and demolishing over 60 square blocks of housing. Some 17,500 African American and Japanese American people saw their homes bulldozed.

With their dreams of "urban renewal," the heads of SF-based corporate giants such as Standard Oil, Bechtel, Del Monte, Southern Pacific, Wells Fargo, and Bank of America reimagined the City as a utopia for big business. The language of a Wells Fargo report from the '60s evokes the notebooks of Dana: "Geographically, San Francisco is a natural gateway for this country's ocean-going and airborne commerce with the Pacific area nations." Likewise, Prologue for Action, a 1966 report from the San Francisco Planning and Urban Renewal Association, might have been written by dystopian visionary Philip K. Dick:

If SF decides to compete effectively with other cities for new "clean" industries and new corporate power, its population will move closer to "standard White Anglo-Saxon Protestant" characteristics. As automation increases the need for unskilled labor will decrease.... The population will tend to range from lower middle-class through upper-class.... Selection of a population's composition might be undemocratic. Influence on it, however, is legal and desirable.

This dream of turning San Francisco into a perfect world for business required that much of the existing city be destroyed. First, the colorful Produce District along the waterfront was removed in 1959, its warmth and human buzz replaced by the four identical modern hulks of the Embarcadero Center. Beginning in 1966, some 87 acres of land south of Market — including 4,000 housing units — were bulldozed to make way for office blocks, luxury hotels, and the Moscone Center.

The dark logic of the Redevelopment Agency's plans are projected into the future in the profoundly bleak science fiction of Richard Paul Russo's Carlucci series from the '90s. Russo's books are set in a 21st-century SF entirely segregated by class and health. The Tenderloin is walled off into an area where drug-addicted and diseased residents kill each other or await death from AIDS or worse. Access to all neighborhoods is restricted and even the series' hero, stereotypical good cop Frank Carlucci, submits to a full body search in order to enter the Financial District because he lacks the necessary chip implant to be waved through checkpoints.

Russo's nightmares have their real side today, and many dreams found in Ecotopia and the Whole Earth Catalog — composting, recycling, widespread bicycling, urban gardening, free access to information via the Internet, Green building design — have also come to pass. (There is even a growing movement to unearth creeks like the Hayes River, which runs under City Hall.) Pat Murphy's 1989 novel, The City Not Long After, imagines these opposing visions of the city will continue even after a plague wipes out all but one-thousandth of SF's population. In Murphy's book, those still alive turn the City into a backdrop for elaborate art projects, weaving ribbon and lace from Macy's across downtown streets and painting the Golden Gate Bridge blue. This artists' utopia is threatened when an army of survivors from Sacramento marches into SF. But the last forces of America, unlike the dot-com invaders of the '90s, prove no match for the artists, who use direct action tactics and magic to rout Sacramento in an epic showdown at Civic Center Plaza.

In Carlsson's After the Deluge, several people enter a bar called New Spec's on Fulton Street. The walls are covered with old SF ephemera. One character explains to Eric, a newcomer, "It's all about nostalgia, a false nostalgia." Was the City a better place before the war, before the earthquakes, or before it was even the City? So many utopian visions of the future evoke a simpler past that one wonders if believing in one is the same as longing for the other. It's a question that would make sense, once again, to Philip K. Dick.

Perhaps no fiction about a future SF captures utopian yearning as well as Dick's decidedly dystopian works, because his stories, though full of futuristic gadgets, are really about the ways human characters relate to them. Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep? (1968) is set in a radically depopulated postwar SF of 2021. The air is filled with radioactive dust and the streets are hauntingly empty as humans race to colonize Mars. Main character Rick Deckard is a bounty hunter assigned to "retire" humanlike androids, yet he's mostly concerned about his electric sheep. Because there are almost no animals left on Earth, owning a fake one helps a striver like Deckard keep up appearances.

In 1962's The Man in the High Castle, Dick imagines life in SF after the Nazis and Japanese have won World War II. Nostalgia haunts this story, too. Protagonist R. Childan makes his living selling rare prewar Americana to rich Japanese collectors. Not much has changed in this alternate SF, though. Market Street is still a place of "shooting galleries [and] cheap nightclubs with photos of middle-aged blondes holding their nipples between their wrinkled fingers and leering." While most utopian futures look to the past, Dick's dystopian futures are all eerily about the present.

So how does Mr. Childan deal with the pain of living in a world where Nazis have won the war? How else? "To inspire himself, he lit up a marijuana cigarette," Dick writes, "excellent Land-O-Smiles brand." SFBG

Raising the bar

By Paul Reidinger
paulr@sfbg.com

If Cheers had served good food instead of cheap beer and persiflage, Dr. Frasier Crane might never have fled to Seattle to start anew. Also, the place might have come to resemble the Alembic, a smallish installation along upper Haight that has been distilled from that nearby citadel of suds, Magnolia Pub and Brewery, now an institution. Unlike Cheers, the Alembic isn't in a basement; it occupies a storefront that was most recently home to Maroc. But, like its distant sitcom relation, it does have a bar scene that radiates human energy, not to mention a bar that looks the way a bar should: busy and used.

The bar is a spectacle, but it isn't there for show. The bottles arranged on the high wall shelves aren't all perfectly turned so the label faces outward, and they're not all in immaculate rows. This is because the bartenders are constantly reaching for them, then reaching for measuring cups, strainers, napkins, and glasses for the whipping up of various libations, from simple to complex. (There's wine too, and if you're a fat guy named Norm, you can even get a beer.) The action is blurring but precise, and Sam Malone probably wouldn't last five minutes under the strain. Like so many other food industry jobs, bartending is a game for the young.

Speaking of the young: there are tons of them at the Alembic, and not just behind the bar. The clientele has a modern Mission District look, yet the Mission, for all its cultural variety, has no street to match Haight Street, no comparable collection of goofballs, edge-dwellers, hustlers, dropouts, and misfits prowling the sidewalks, or just sitting on them. But that's outside, and inside ... well, out is out and in is in, as Kipling might have put it, and never (or at least hardly ever) the twain shall meet. Getting to the Alembic can be an excellent adventure, but once you're inside, you might as well be at 16th and Valencia streets.

Because the front of the small space is dominated by the shrine-like bar, it's possible to overlook the dining area toward the rear. Here people are eating food, and it's surprisingly sophisticated food — sophisticated for a bar, sophisticated for the Haight, which despite or because of its international reputation is a little short on interesting places to eat.

Let's say you were interested in a dish with truffles, for instance, and you could only look on Haight Street. You might try RNM, which is probably the best restaurant on either Lower or Upper Haight. But the Alembic has truffled dishes; one is the macaroni and cheese ($9), which carries the definite black-earth perfume of truffles as relayed through infused oil. The mac and cheese is also made with Gruyère (another discreet flash of toniness) and, we thought, a bit of bacon or pancetta for some meatiness. If the truffle is an incitement to class warfare, how clever to put its essence in dish that's the very picture of Middle American modesty.

Truffling the gnocchi ($9) might be riskier — the word is harder to pronounce, for one thing. But the truffle infusion goes nicely with the hedgehog mushrooms nestled next to the gnocchi pillows themselves, while splintered asparagus stalks bring some green and speak of spring.

The menu is notably vegetarian-friendly, even beyond the gnocchi. The kitchen performs discreet wonders with that revolting winter beauty, the beet, by turning both red and yellow examples into carpaccio ($6) and topping each with slender, glistening, gelatinous coins with a dab of goat cheese and sprig of watercress. And let's give some extra credit for the presentation, which is on a slightly concave porcelain rectangle like those used for serving sushi rolls. (All the plates and platters are handsome, incidentally. Very unbarlike.)

Then there are the little snacks, or nibbles, among them slightly sweet nuts roasted with sage ($3) and a cone of excellent herbed frites ($5) spiked with lemongrass and accompanied by with a small tub of chipotle aioli. We found the nuts underpowered; they could have used some salt and maybe some chili heat to balance the sweetness. But the frites were svelte, crisp, and sublime.

They also went nicely with one of the menu's handful of meaty dishes: Moroccan-style sliders ($10), halves of a beautifully juicy, medium-rare lamb burger served on toast points, with harissa aioli, roasted peppers, and tapenade. The burger doesn't come with the fries, but you might think about having them together, in part because burgers cry out for fries, and if you're interested in a burger you're probably pretty hungry, and this burger isn't that big. A man in full dinner mode could easily eat three, and that would put the tab at a Manhattan-ish $30.

If that seems a little (or a lot) steep, you could go to Plan B: dessert. No one would ever mistake the Alembic for Sweet Inspiration, but the kitchen does manage to turn out some respectable confections. A strawberry beignet ($7), for example, turns out to be an actual freshly fried doughnut, complete with a tight hole in the middle, but the strawberry refers only to the pat of strawberry ice cream on top, which was a pretty pink but too sweet. Better balanced are the troika of s'mores ($7), with homemade marshmallow, lengths of fresh banana on top, and a chocolate hazelnut sauce slithering around the plate. The sauce is tasty but difficult to eat, since the s'mores themselves aren't very absorbent and have a way of disappearing in a single, gratifying bite. A smaller s'more need not be a lesser s'more. SFBG

Jam of lords, lords of jam

Blenheim, as those of us who feel the occasional twitch upon the thread of Anglophilia will recall, is the ancestral home of the dukes of Marlborough as well as the birthplace of Sir Winston Churchill, a figure much admired by, though not at all resembling, le George W. Bush. Blenheim is also a type of apricot, and Blenheim apricots were indeed grown on the grounds of Blenheim Palace in the 19th century; in due course the fruit, taking its way ever westward, arrived in California. You can occasionally find Blenheims at farmers markets; in addition, if you like or even love jam, they can be found in the jam produced by welove-jam.com (www.welovejam.com), a tiny San Francisco concern that until recently was making its entire production of apricot jam from the fruit of a single Blenheim tree in the Santa Clara valley.

The Blenheim, despite its grand pedigree, has recently fallen on parlous times. Its fruit is smaller and slower to ripen than other varieties of apricot and, in my experience, can have a greenish tinge when bought fresh. ("Let them ripen for three or four days," I was told when I bought some last year. I did, and several rotted, which was rather irritating at $4 per pound.) These delicate qualities, while redolent of Old World charm and languor, do suggest that the fruit is at least as well-served being made into jam as harvested, shipped, and sold fresh in our mechanized agricultural economy. As with canned tomatoes, the right sort of processing — loving processing — can show Blenheims at their best.

The duo behind WLJ, Eric Haeblerl and Phineas Hoang, don't use the word "love" lightly. Their entire enterprise (whose roots are traceable to some impromptu jam-making in 2002) is about passion, not money, from the saving of a particular type of apricot to the packaging of everything they make (including barbecue sauce and superlative biscotti) in containers that are either recyclable or, in the case of their cellophane sacks, compostable.

At the moment, WLJ looks a little the way Recchiuti Confections did a few years ago: it's a tiny and unlikely freckle on the face of the food business. But (as the young Alfie so gloomily observed in Annie Hall) the universe is expanding, and WLJ's products (available through the Web site) could soon be coming to Bi-Rite — and from there, who knows? SFBG

Chickens and cake

By L.E. Leone

> le_chicken_farmer@yahoo.com

CHEAP EATS

I put the chocolate chip cookies in my purse¹ and of course forgot about them. There were three, homemade and perfect, and the small plastic bag that they were in immediately entangled itself with feed store receipts, directions to junkyards, takeout menus from restaurants I've been meaning to eat at for 14 years, a barrette, some lipstick, and hand cream. The pills, pen, loose change, and wads of ones go without saying, I presume. And the sunflower seeds.

My chickens, who will go to their skillets believing that grass falls out of the sky, have more of a sweet tooth than I do. Which is saying something if you know anything at all about chickens. And especially if the thing you know is that they don't have teeth. That's why they need stones and grit, to churn around in their gizzards, like nickels in a purse, and grind up the wads of grass, grain, bugs, and birthday cake that make up their diet. And sunflower seeds.

Oh, and grass does fall out of the sky, by the way, if you are one of my chickens, and you live in the woods, and the floor of your woody world is redwood needles and dirt but you are lucky enough to have a caring and dedicated farmer whose time, in defiance of tens of thousands of years of human thinking on the subject, is not valuable. Meaning she will happily goat around every day in greener environs, on the "other side of the fence," pulling up grass and throwing it over to your side.

Long pause.

Even longer pause ...

As long a pause as you will let me get away with without losing you to your horoscope or the page with pictures of even sexier trannies than me.

Then: birthday cake?

Well, yeah, what were you expecting? Chocolate chip cookies? Didn't I tell you I forgot about them? And that they were perfect? Whereas the cake, on the other hand, was already leftover when it was left at my shack by some superheroes. And that was more than a week ago. And my birthday isn't until May. And I don't have a sweet tooth or a sweet gizzard.

Still, I would have eaten the whole, huge, three-quarters of a cake, instead of none of it, in the interest of having healthier chickens, and therefore healthier eggs, and therefore being healthier myself ... except that the superhero who made the cake, first time ever from scratch, insisted that it sucked.

If it doesn't taste good or have nutritional value, I'll still eat it, but not if it's cake. I'll leave it on the counter until it's almost moldy and then, at the risk of one day getting my head chopped off by chickens, I'll let them eat it. As the saying goes.

I set half of three-quarters of the homemade chocolate cake on the ground and watched them treat it the way any small group of women would. Chickens see one thing out of one eye, and something else out of the other. They looked and they looked, with adoration and with horror, and then finally one took a peck and ran away. Then came back. Then they all started doing that, eating, retreating, chattering. And then they didn't bother to retreat or chatter — they just chowed down.

I put the rest of the cake in their coop, closed them up with it, and went to the city, half-expecting to come home the next morning and find them not only dead, but dead on the ceiling instead of the floor.

As we speak I am inventing spaghetti-cue, lest anyone think me a slacker. There's a bag of cookie crumbs in my purse, a carton of post-expiration date milk in the fridge, and chickens in my yard, alive, well, and running. Like every day, they have left me a nest full of eggs, some smudged with chocolate frosting.

My new favorite restaurant is Robata Grill & Sushi in Mill Valley. Not that I ate there. They let me use their phone and ladies room when my engine popped en route to the city. One of the last four or five people without a cell phone or a reliable car, I stood outside on the corner, cold night, lamenting these facts and others, waiting for my rescue. The people on the other side of the windows seemed warm, happy, well-fed, and yeah, a little bit rich. I was wearing my sexiest skirt and my rabbit. Late for a gig. Probably looked, from the inside out, like a prostitute. New favorite restaurant. SFBG

Life is advertising. Or life is television. Or maybe life is a television ad. So it goes for the Americans in the big, bright, and intelligently vulgar films of Frank Tashlin, such as 1955's Artists & Models (left, featuring Dean Martin) and 1957's Will Success Spoil Rock Hunter? (center, with Jayne Mansfield and a pre-Felix Tony Randall). There's nothing like a burst of enforced spontaneity to free the spirit — at least until romantic conventions crash the party in Chaos Theory (right, starring Ryan Reynolds).

Bigger than life

In praise of the overabundant films of Frank Tashlin

By Max Goldberg
> a&cletters@sfbg.com

How would you define an improbable Tilt-A-Whirl Technicolor or Vistavision or Cinemascope view of American virtue and vice? Jean-Luc Godard's term for it was Tashlinesque. Watching the feverish films in the Pacific Film Archive's short Frank Tashlin retrospective, we see an artist pushing the outermost limits of cinematic realism, gorging 1950s America on its desire for bigger, better, and faster.

The Tashlinesque land of excess encompasses Jayne Mansfield's breasts, Kool Aid-red convertibles, and bubblegum teenagers. If there is a milk bottle in a Tashlin film, it will cream when a pin-up walks by. Ten-gallon hats spontaneously ejaculate oil. "The room temperature is changing, if you catch my cruder meaning," Mansfield coos in Will Success Spoil Rock Hunter? (1957), and we do, over and over again. Tashlin's America is a nation of alcoholics and dupes, softheaded nincompoops and sexpot cynics. France had Jacques Tati, and we had — and have — Tashlin.

Just as it did with other stateside pulp visionaries, it took the French to recognize Tashlin's genius. "There is not a difference in degree between Hollywood or Bust [1956] and It Happened One Night [1934]... but a difference of kind," Godard wrote in a 1957 assessment for Cahiers du Cinéma. There's a touch of cruelty (and a trace of the director's cartoon roots) in Tashlin's preference for physically excessive actors like Mansfield and Jerry Lewis, though the way he uses these figures to channel the distorting nature of American gluttony and naïveté is brutally effective.

It's not just the bodies that are inflated. The frame itself seems to be stretched over the course of these films, with camera angles and props used to accentuate the horizontality of the widescreen image. Just as Preston Sturges outdid his era of talky screwballs with dialogue-mad farces, Tashlin amplified '50s Hollywood's taste for grandiosity and crudeness to a pointedly unmanageable extreme. His self-aware movies give a sharp sense of the studio system in its death throes.

As satire, Tashlin's send-ups of ad men and agents are as prescient as they are unsparing. A typical Tashlin alarm is sounded when Dean Martin's character in Artists & Models (1955) announces at the outset that he moved to New York to make money in order to study art. In Will Success Spoil Rock Hunter?, Tony Randall's title character turns on the television to hear what the starlet Rita Marlowe (Mansfield) is saying to reporters on his front lawn — an apt commentary on the way technologies abstract reality and invade our privacy. The spin cycles continue to gain speed: the '90s were an especially prime slice of the Tashlinesque, what with a booming economy, celebrity sex tapes, and the Monica Lewinsky scandal. Cinematically speaking, Richard Kelly just tried his hand at Tashlinesque with Southland Tales (2006), though I can't help thinking the originator would have done better with the musical numbers.

Tashlin's burlesque is dexterous, but it doesn't hatch from any stable logic. Television is clearly the enemy, but the movies aren't much better. With every bathing beauty and each overripe burst of Technicolor, the director indulges and implicates our most blithering desires. (One feels like a child reaching out for a lollipop while watching Tashlin's films: when Godard famously quipped that there was no blood in his own 1965 Pierrot le fou but only red, he might have been quoting his American forebear.) If the plots nominally resolve themselves, the tone and visual style remain pitched between splendor and disgust.

"By exposing people to an endless stream of advertising, television taught them to take nothing at face value, to read everything ironically," Louis Menand recently wrote in the New Yorker. It was Tashlin who taught us to see this way. If there were any justice to art history, he would be in the pantheon of Pop Art, not just for his content, but also for his bold use of color and scale. But he of all people would have known that artistic success is on the same shaky ground as achievement in politics, entertainment, and business — same as it ever was. —SFBG

CHAOS THEORY: FUN, BUT NO DICE MAN

Though early paperback editions brandished a "Soon to Be a Major Motion Picture" tag, there's never been a movie of the 1971 cult novel The Dice Man. That's a pity, because this tale of a psychiatrist who ditches his too-orderly life — by beginning to roll dice to make decisions — is a screen natural. I bet screenwriter Daniel Taplit has read the Luke Rhinehart (a.k.a. George Cockcroft) book. His and director Marcos Siega's Chaos Theory is a Dice Man update, softened and family values-sweetened for our counter-cultural age. Ryan Reynolds plays Frank, a best-selling efficiency expert whose life derails in a marital meltdown. Pulling a 180, he decides "never to make a decision again" and to rely on random index-card suggestions instead. Streaking, bar fights, extramarital sex, no-hands motorcycle riding, and other vicarious freedoms ensue. Just when it hits its giddy comic stride, Chaos Theory retreats into conventional, sentimental terrain. Still, Frank's brief vacation from conformity might give some people ideas. (As Dice Man once did for me, when I embarked on an interstate hitchhiking trek.) And if Kerouac's On the Road (1957) might finally reach the screen after a half-century, there's hope for Rhinehart's book. In fact, Paramount claims a movie version is "in development." "Course, they've been saying that for 30-plus years. (Dennis Harvey)

"No Borders, No Limits: 1960s Nikkatsu Action Cinema"

PREVIEW In 1960s Japan, Nikkatsu meant a new kind of action. Promotional materials for the studio even spelled "action" in katakana, the syllabary used for borrowed foreign words. Indeed, the studio's super-stylized films — only a smattering of which are showcased in this all too brief series presented by Yerba Buena Center for the Arts and Outcast Cinema — reflected many of the postwar period's cultural sea changes. Played by an exclusive line of marquee names including boyish rake Watari Tetsuya and the chipmunk-countenanced Joe Shishido, Nikkatsu's lone wolves and hit men hang out at rock and jazz clubs, drive hotwired foreign cars, get in brawls with white devil sailors, and possess the kind of smoldering cool that Elmore Leonard thinks he copyrighted. Similarly, directors such as Toshio Masuda, Takashi Nomura, and the better-known Suzuki Seijun developed a kinetic visual style that cribbed from Jean-Luc Godard, Sergio Leone, and Frank Tashlin in equal measure (Suzuki's extreme stylistic bravura eventually got him canned). It's the first two directors who merit closer looks. Nomura's awesomely titled A Colt Is My Passport (1967) stars Shishido as a sniper on the lam, and its finale — both desolate and explosive — tops any spaghetti western's final showdown. Shishido makes another appearance in Masuda's The Velvet Hustler (1967), this time sporting a creepy Chaplin-stache. His quarry is Goro (Tetsuya), a Tokyo hit man and all around playboy who is forced to lay low in the international port city of Kobe after a botched job and becomes the city's slacker underworld kingpin. But even a poor little rich girl (the perfectly cog Ruriko Asaoka) from the capital can't hold Goro's fickle attentions for long. In Nikkatsu action, it's a man's world. Dames come and go, but these boys only have eyes (and silent tears) for their fallen brothers in crime. (Matt Sussman)

OPENING

Boarding Gate French 5-M thriller starring Asia Argento (1:56) Clay.

Bonneville Bearing a passing resemblance to 1993's Thelma and Louise, Bonneville is a road chick flick. Jessica Lange, Kathy Bates and Joan Allen play three good friends (recently widowed Arville, naughty Margene, and reserved Carol, respectively) who jump into a 1966 Ford Mustang convertible — scarves, sunglasses and all — and drive from Pocatello, Idaho to Santa Barbara in order to deliver Arville's husband's ashes to the burial ground his daughter has prepared for him. Christopher N. Rowley's feature debut (based on writer Daniel D. Davis's first produced screenplay) is a conventional and entirely predictable genre film. That means the biggest pleasure one gets is from watching these grand actresses cruise through some breathtakingly beautiful Western landscapes. (1:33) Presidio. (Komodore) Chaos Theory See "Fun, but No Dice Man," page 62. (1:26) Embarcadero. College Kiddle idol Drake Bell stars in this campus comedy. (1:34).

Hollywood Chinese First-rank documentary! Arthur Dong's latest is a survey of Chinese and Chinese American imagery in mainstream U.S. cinema. He draws commentary from a dizzying array of interviewees, including old-school "exotics" Turhan Bey and Tsai Chin, erstwhile "yellowface" actors Christopher Lee and Luise Rainer, transitional-era figures like James Hong and James Shigeta, plus current, less-fettered talents Ang Lee, Wayne Wang, Justin Lin, and B.D. Wong. It's fun to hear Nancy Kwan and Joan Chen expressing slightly embarrassed but hey-a-girl'sgotta-eat sentiments about the more dragon-lady-ish roles they've accepted for lack of better offers. It's fascinating to hear about James B. Leong and Marion Wong, silent-era pioneers in independent Chinese American filmmaking whose efforts were sadly stonewalled by theatres and distributors. But in many ways the principal delight here is watching a parade of good-quality, original-aspect-ratio clips encompassing everything from Broken Blossoms (1919) to Charlie Chan movies, 1998's Xiu Xiu to 2002's Better Luck Tomorrow. (Strangely, Michael Cimino's Year of the Dragon, which incited community protests in 1985, is omitted.) Unlike prior docs indicting Hollywood's attitudes toward African Americans, gays, Arabs, etc., this one is surprisingly low on anger. Most participants philosophically, even bemusedly, view past stereotyping as cultural visibility that at least paved the way for more accurate depictions while keeping some talents employed, however unworthily. (1:29) Grand Lake, Kabuki (Harvey)

Irina Palm Plump, dowdy middle-aged widow Maggie's (Marianne Faithfull) only grandchild has a terminal illness, and the only remaining option is an experimental treatment in Australia. Sans skills or employment history, Maggie takes the only job offered her — giving handjobs through a glory hole at a strip club. Despite her revulsion (and arm motions that suggest more pot-scrubbing than pleasure-giving), she turns out to possess "the best right hand in London," and soon has "ten limps up outside the door for a few minutes with the unseen but presumably red-hot 'Irina Palm.'" This concept might have provided a hilarious vehicle for, say, Julie Walters, Maggie Smith, or even (perhaps especially) the late Divine. No such luck, though. The god-riddled script and Sam Garbarski's even worse direction treat Maggie's saga as straight-up Brit miserabilism meets inspirational uplift, as if our heroine gets to show up the snooty, snooty middle-class ladies (led by Jenny Agutter) who in real-world England wouldn't be her friends anyway. IN THEATRES FRIDAY, APRIL 18 for drabbing down, but in truth she's just not much of an actress. (1:43) Opera Plaza, Shattuck, Smith Rafael. (Harvey)

My Brother Is an Only Child An Italian family epic directed by Daniele Luchetti. (1:48) Never Forever At first, its purely business: as a last-resort response to her Korean American husband's infertility, Sophie (The Departed's Vera Farmiga, sporting an ice-blond do) lurks after a Korean immigrant (Jung-woo Ha) she spots at a fertility clinic. She pays him big bucks to have sex with her and possibly make a baby — thereby saving her husband (David L. McInnis) from depression and getting his intensely Christian family off their backs. Of course, things get complicated mighty fast. Farmiga is riveting in this deliberately quiet drama, a delicate exploration of doing the wrong thing for the right reasons — and grappling with the sudden realization that wrong and right are often not so easy to define. (1:41) Kabuki. (Eddy)

Prom Night Another horror remake. (1:28) Shattuck.
Refusenik A documentary about the international movement to free Soviet Jews (1:57) Bridge. Smart People Cut from very much the same cloth as 2006's Little Miss Sunshine and 2005's The Upside of Anger, Noam Baumbach movies, and yada yada, this latest seriocomic "indie" dysfunctional-family demolition derby is watchable but lacks the edge or originality of similar, better recent exercises. Lawrence Westerhold (Dennis Quaid) is a grumpy, widowed English prof whose daughter Vanessa (Ellen Page) reluctantly runs his household, and whose son James (Ashton Holmes) is barely communicative. When Lawrence suffers a brought-it-on-himself accident, he's briefly hospitalized and considered at remote risk for brain damage — which under law means he can't drive for six months. This means he's forced to take in broke, homeless, in-trouble adoptive brother Chuck (Thomas Haden Church) as his temporary and highly unreliable chauffeur. Chuck manages to loosen the hypercontrolling mental screws on Young Republican Vanessa while Lawrence endeavors to soften his own crankypants demeanor to encourage the surprise romantic attentions from former student turned ER doc Janet Hartigan (Sarah Jessica Parker). Quaid has fun in a disheveled change-of-pace role, Page proves her smart-mouthed act isn't tired yet, and ever-valuable Hagen Church is a major plus. Still, this first feature for both novelist-turned-screenwriter Mark Jude Poirier and commercials director Noam Murro is basically decent cable fare with pricier-than-usual cast names. (1:33) California, Piedmont, Presidio. (Harvey)

Street Kings James Ellroy cowrote this tale of a conflicted LAPD cop played by — whoa! — Keanu Reeves. (1:47)

ONGOING

Bab'Aziz: The Prince Who Contemplated His Soul (1:36) Lumiere, Shattuck, Smith Rafael.

The Band's Visit (1:29) Albany, Opera Plaza.

The Bank Job (1:50) Elmwood, Four Star, 1000 Van Ness, SF Centre.

The Counterfeiter (1:39) Embarcadero, Shattuck.

Definitely, Maybe (2:07) Elmwood, SF Centre.

Dr. Seuss' Horton Hears a Who! (1:28) Grand Lake, 1000 Van Ness, (Atwal).

Drillbit Taylor (1:42) SF Centre, (Komodore).

The Duchess of Langeais (2:17) Elmwood, Lumiere, (Mason).

Flawless (1:45) Embarcadero, Shattuck.

(Komodore)

In Bruges (1:47) Elmwood, Four Star, Opera Plaza, (Chun)

Leatherheads Following two terrific movies, this third feature proves George Clooney the director is fallible after all — though Clooney the movie star is in fine form. He's Dodge Connolly, aging leader of the Duluth Bulldogs. Back then, college football ball was king and the pro kind a threadbare mixture of amateur athletes, turnip-field venues, and rule-free antics. Dodge's team has disbanded when he hits on an idea that reassembles the crew and attracts hitherto-elusive huge crowds. The latter stems from Dodge's clever seduction — the mental kind — of celebrated Princeton quarterback and war hero Carter Rutherford (John Krasinski). Unfortunately, Carter also attracts attention — mental and otherwise — from ace reporter Lexi Littleton (Renée Zellweger), whose editor sends her to worm out the supposed lie of his WWI combat glory. Of course, smart-mouths Dodge and Lexi resist acknowledging they're made for each other. Clooney gives great Clark Gable, and even if Zellweger is no Claudette Colbert, she's OK here. But Leatherheads' lavish homage to 1930s screwball comedies is as tonally forced and stylistically phony as it is charming and funny. Clooney's skill on and behind camera is admirable, as well as his earnest desire to create a piece of big populist entertainment playable one or three generations ago. So blame the empire: Leatherheads' 51 percent flatfish v. 49 percent pretty-to-very-good content adds up to a respectable home-team loss. (1:54) Grand Lake, 1000 Van Ness, Orinda, Presidio, Shattuck, (Harvey).

Married Life (1:39) Elmwood, Empire.

Miss Pettigrew Lives for a Day (1:51) California, Empire, Opera Plaza, Piedmont.

Nim's Island Starring Little Miss Sunshine (2006) sensation Abigail Breslin, this is a fantasy family film adapted from Wendy Orr's children's novel of the same title. Nim (Breslin) and her marine-biologist father Jack (300's Gerard Butler, here playing two roles) live in an undiscovered, virginal island paradise where the former spends her days running around the beach in the company of sea lions and pelicans, and the latter engages in excessive research dedicated to nanophytoplankton. Things change when extremely agoraphobic action writer Alexandra Rover (Jodie Foster) and her alter ego, the Indiana Jones-like hero Alex Rover (Butler), get added to the equation. Counter to the promise of its beautifully animated opening sequence, Nim's Island rapidly becomes a corny tale about finding the courage to overcome one's fears. (1:35) 1000 Van Ness, Orinda, SF Centre, (Komodore).

No Country for Old Men (1:56) 1000 Van Ness, SF Centre.

The Other Boleyn Girl (1:54) 1000 Van Ness, SF Centre.

BAY GUARDIAN PET OF THE WEEK

Sabrina (A025864)

This pretty, little, 6-year old lady was very scared when she first came to the shelter, but she has since come a long way, although she may hide in a new home, and may still be shy of hands coming at her too quickly. Gentle handling and a lot of patience will help her to continue her socialization. Please don't pick Sabrina up or she may get upset. Playtime with interactive toys would be most appreciated and encouraged. A quiet loving home and patient adopters will be just the thing for this cutie pie

When you adopt ADULT CATS from The San Francisco SPCA, you'll get all the awesome goodies that come with pets from The San Francisco SPCA: a free first medical exam from a local veterinarian, temporary identification tags, and a medical assistance plan. All this and an absolutely fabulous cat for $80 EACH (including tax)

A-gain

By Andrea Nemerson
> andrea@altsexcolumn.com

Dear Andrea:

I have a friend who claims to be asexual. Although women (and occasionally men) have expressed romantic interest in him, he never seems to want to pursue a physical relationship — or any kind of intimate relationship at all. He says he's quite happy, but I'm confused. Doesn't everyone have some level of sexual desire? Or is there really an asexual community out there which is happy to be untouched? What do you know about this?

Love,
A OK?

Dear A OK?

Oh, lots. I wrote about asexuality a few years ago following a big cover story about it in New Scientist [11/03/04], in the course of which I discovered that the movement's Web master and spokesperson, David Jay, is not only local but went to my alma mater with a close friend of mine and therefore is practically family. So I know everything about it!

OK, I don't know everything — but I can answer questions. Most people, barring those rarities like the This American Life interviewee I call "The Man with No Testosterone," may have "some level" of sexual desire flickering away in there somewhere. But if that flame is sufficiently dim or sufficiently unappealing to the flickeree, he or she may chose to ignore it altogether. Some, though, have searched their psyches and failed to detect even the faintest flicker of interest, and they may feel fine about that. It seems to me that the most reasonable reaction to people who feel fine is to feel fine back at them. Still, asexuality remains somewhat of a hard sell.

For whatever reason, many people — sexual people — find it hard to accept the idea that nobody is under any obligation either to feel desire or to act on it. Most of us are accustomed both to wanting sex and to wanting to want sex. (Desire disorders are the new erectile dysfunction — expect to see, say, Michelle Obama starring in a commercial for a breakthrough treatment in a few years.) How can people have no desire to feel desire? Aren't they broken? Don't they want to be fixed? Shouldn't they want to be fixed? If you take these sane, rational adults at their word, that word is no.

As I was procrastinating answering your question a friend mentioned she knew an asexual woman who'd been interviewed about it on TV, which led me to this YouTube clip (www.youtube.com/watch?v=CeKGOMUVU7g) where you can see many of the asexuality movement's big names (well, it's a small pond, but these are the people who are most frequently interviewed and featured on Web sites and the like) telling their stories and proudly proclaiming their lack of interest in getting in your pants. (I can't remember the chant I made up for them the last time I wrote about this: "We're A / We're OK / Now just go away," maybe?) I can't promise that this clip or any of the others available online is any better than any other 4.5 minutes given a serious but potentially salacious subject on a typical TV magazine show. After the interviews the reporter turns to the camera and dutifully chirps, "Of course, some experts doubt even the existence of asexuality!" Of course they do! There are experts who will appear on these shows to doubt the existence of air if it gets them on TV. And then there's the odious sexologist Joy Davidson, who offers this take while wearing an awful lot of lipstick:

Presenter: Can labeling oneself asexual become a self-fulfilling prophecy?

Davidson: You might as well label yourself not curious, unadventurous, narrow-minded, blind to possibilities.... That's what happens when you label yourself as ... sexually neutered.

Well, they didn't label themselves that way, lady. You did. Davidson's insistence that people who don't want to have sex must be in some way damaged reminds me, irritatingly, of another well-known sex therapist I heard claiming that Viagra and friends cause as much damage to a relationship as they repair, and that if you really want to overcome erectile dysfunction you have to see a therapist. But Davidson is meaner.

So, yes, your friend is probably telling the truth, and yes, there is such a community of "out" asexuals, albeit largely online (but there's no shame in that — all hail the Internet's awesome community-building powers!). The one thing you're wrong about is the supposition that such people eschew intimacy of any sort. There are folks like that, of course, but we'd do better to call them "hermits." Asexuals have intense friendships and even romantic relationships. They identify, in many cases, as straight or gay, although it's hard not to imagine an asexual lesbian, for instance, as someone who's particularly interested in not having sex with women. You could get a little woozy thinking that way.

I do have to admit wondering whether asexuals like David Jay could be having as much "fun" as they routinely claim to have. "We're having too much fun to have sex!" How much fun does anyone have, really, who isn't, say, a professional skateboarder or a four-year-old? Who has the time?

Love,
Andrea

TAURUS

April 20–May 20
Have you been avoiding craptastic conversations with your friends? The sorts of chats that fill you with dread and send you directly to the couch to zone out on reality TV? Well, this would be a great week to have those talks. Be present and don't expect results, but do it.

GEMINI

May 21–June 21
This is a week for being in motion. This may be metaphorical: overcoming real obstacles, having difficult confrontations, or whatnot. Or it might mean you actually get on a bike or hop on a Greyhound and get gone. In any case, your move will be a good one.

CANCER

June 22–July 22
You'll be going through some meaningful internal transformations in your heart. The worst thing would be to think that you know what these changes mean for your future. You don't know squat. Don't waste your time trying to peer into the great unknown; focus on letting go.

LEO

July 23–Aug. 22
Your brain is like the Energizer Bunny on a keyful of meth. You're just going and going and going, making a decreasing amount of sense. Surely soon you'll be picking your face into a giant scab. Unpleasant! Try selecting one brilliant insight and sticking with it.

VIRGO

Aug. 23–Sept. 22
Your greatest success will come from being open and in touch with your best interests and those of the people around you. Disaster will come from projecting your fear and anxiety onto various possible scenarios and getting all riled up.

LIBRA

Sept. 23–Oct. 22
You're in the right emotional place at the right emotional time. You're yourself and everyone likes you. You could totally screw this up, however, by making sudden changes or generally being a flipped-out spaz. Don't take on anything new this week.

SCORPIO

Oct. 23–Nov. 21
The time has come for you to truly break down and let go of those crappy old habits that have been complicating your life. Deep changes are necessary and you're going to have to submit to a host of short-term pains in order to achieve a higher level of living.

SAGITTARIUS

Nov. 22–Dec. 2
Sag, it's important for you to be open and positive, and to work on staying mindful of the difference between anxiety and intuition. We see you vacillating between states of buoyant positivity and tweaked-out tweakiness. Observe how your mood affects reality.

CAPRICORN

Dec. 23–Jan. 19
This is the best week you've had in months! Because you've applied yourself so wisely and diligently, you're now in a position to bring your most true self into your closest relationships. We see you getting clear about the mistakes you've made in the past and moving forward.

AQUARIUS

Jan. 20–Feb. 18
While this is a great time to begin something new, there's a danger of getting in over your head and freaking the frick out. Be wise about your boundaries and make sure that anything you begin feels like an organic extension of yourself.

PISCES

Feb. 19–March 20
Time to deal with your higher and lower intentions. Identify any passive-aggressive ways of enabling yourself to perpetuate any crappy dynamics, and investigate how you could use clearness and directness as tools for real change. SFBG
